PREFACE

"Since 1779 the United States Army Corps of Engineers has built an impressive record of achievement in a broad range of activities relating to the development, utilization, and conservation of the nation's land and water resources... The Corps is now utilizing its experience and knowledge in support of worldwide development programs."¹⁾ "The preparation and maintenance of national programs for social and economic development are difficult and complex tasks which challenge the best efforts of public officials and planners. Essential to such planning is an adequate knowledge of people concerned and of the physical, social and economic resources available to them. Although some information is usually available, the basic resources data required are often lacking."²⁾ "A managed program of data collection, storage and retrieval is basic to any systematic analysis of a nation's resources. This is accomplished at EARI by a continuing program of data acquisition involving domestic and foreign travel, national and international purchase and exchange arrangements and intensive collection research. The results of this program are maintained in a working file of selective hard copy material and to a much greater degree in a voluminous research card catalog containing appropriately indexed references to resource data held in other repositories throughout the world."³⁾ Increasingly those concerned with development also recognize the ecological implications of proposed projects. In commenting on one phase of the Mekong Project, Lee M. Talbot of the Smithsonian Institution states: "First, we would emphasize that we are dealing with a very complex environment about which relatively little is still known ... we lack an inventory of the plant and animal species of the area."⁴⁾

The social resources may be the subject of other bibliographies. This one concerns itself only with physical resources as described below. In the first edition, we stated: "If the person ... could find the information he needs on a particular country in one source, his task would be greatly simplified ... But there is no national bibliography on natural resources and no comprehensive bibliography of area studies. Although topics are sometimes subdivided by place in the indexing and abstracting services, these tools are rarely arranged geographically. There are bibliographies on specific resources and/or specific countries which are too little known and not easy to locate. Yet these contain information, especially on fugitive and unpublished data, which may be especially pertinent."⁵⁾ That first edition was a contribution to the stated need of an annotated list of bibliographies arranged geographically. This second edition is a further contribution toward the same goal. Your continuing comments and suggestions are invited.

Scope and coverage. The term "natural resources" is here interpreted to include atmosphere, earth, water, climate, plants and animals individually and in interrelationship. "Bibliography" is used as any list which is arranged either by subject, or geographically, or in a form which readily reveals this information. It is also stretched to include lists of research on the grounds that results will be published - this is indicated in annotations on these entries. Straight author or title lists have been excluded.

Like the first, this edition includes mainly titles in English and western European languages. It includes bibliographies located in the following libraries: U.S. Dept. of the Interior, U.S. Dept. of State, U.S. Geological Survey, Joint Library of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, U.S. Army Topographic Command; and the collections at the U.S. Engineer Agency for Resources Inventories, the U.S. Agency for International Development, Bureau for Vietnam, Research

Evaluation and Information Center, and the U.S. Agency for International Development, Historical and Technical Reference Branch. It also includes particularly pertinent bibliographies in other libraries which have come to the attention of the compiler. Copies of the bibliographies listed may be seen at EARI or we will furnish information as to other sources where they may be located. It is hoped that future editions will increase the coverage of this list.

Arrangement. General bibliographies are listed first, those with an asterisk indicate that subjects are subdivided, or entries indexed by place. This section is further broken down into general bibliographies followed by those on specific resources. Following these are bibliographies on specific regions or countries according to an arrangement based on that of the U.S. Bureau of the Budget. Those treating two or more countries in the same areas are listed under the region or geographic feature only; those treating two or more countries in different areas are repeated under each country covered. Those which contain mainly publications on one country are usually listed under that country even though they may contain some references to others. Exceptions are national bibliographies and those that have both strong country and general coverage; these appear in both places.

Within each group, entries are arranged alphabetically by author with corporate preferred to personal author. Prices and publishers' addresses are given if known. If the author is also the publisher this information is not repeated. The order in each entry is as follows: serials - author, title (used as main entry if no author) frequency, date of first issue and closing date if applicable, publisher, publisher's address and price; monographs - author, title, personal author if any, date, paging, series note if any, publisher, publisher's address and price. The annotation concludes the entry.

If the bibliography is in more than one language, only one is used in the body of the entry, the others are indicated in a note. If any of the languages is English, the English is preferred, otherwise the official, or one of the official languages of the country is chosen.

There are alphabetical author and title indexes.

Thanks are, of course, due to the personnel of the agencies visited who made their facilities available and to all who assisted in the preparation of this edition. It is hoped that this somewhat more inclusive but still preliminary effort will be sufficiently useful to elicit demands for continuation of the bibliography as did the first.
