Monterey, California

THESIS

THE BEAR AND THE FOXES UNDERSTANDING SOVIET POLICY
IN THE WARSAW PACT,

by

David L. Greene

Jun 81

Thesis Advisor: Stephen A. Garrett

Approved for public release; distribution unlimited
Eastern Europe has been the infant terrible of international politics in the modern era. Conflict within and about this region has precipitated two devastating world wars and continues to threaten the stability of the international system. In the postwar era, the Soviet Union has exerted its dominance in Eastern Europe in a manner which the Tsars would have surely envied. It is this dominance and the instruments through which it is achieved, that this paper is concerned.
20. (continued)

Born of the East-West Cold War struggle, the Warsaw Pact has evolved to symbolize the calculated Soviet subjugation of Eastern Europe in the political and military spheres. This unwanted partnership, imposed by the Soviets on their reluctant allies, is far from the alliance Soviet spokesmen would claim. It is rather an instrument of a much broader integrationist program design to entrap and keep Eastern Europe in the socialist web.
The Bear and the Foxes Understanding Soviet Policy
in the Warsaw Pact

by

David L. Greene
Lieutenant, United States Navy
B.S., U.S. Naval Academy, 1974

Submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of

MASTER OF ARTS IN NATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS

from the
NAVAL POSTGRADUATE SCHOOL
June 1981

Author:

Approved by:
Stephen A. Garrett
Thesis Advisor

Herman W. Blanton
Second Reader

Chairman, Department of National Security Affairs

Dean of Information and Policy Sciences
ABSTRACT

Eastern Europe has been the infant terrible of international politics in the modern era. Conflict within and about this region has precipitated two devastating world wars and continues to threaten the stability of the international system. In the post-war era, the Soviet Union has exerted its dominance in Eastern Europe in a manner which the Tsars would have surely envied. It is this dominance and the instruments through which it is achieved, that this paper is concerned.

Born of the East-West Cold War struggle, the Warsaw Pact has evolved to symbolize the calculated Soviet subjugation of Eastern Europe in the political and military spheres. This unwanted partnership, imposed by the Soviets on their reluctant allies, is far from the alliance Soviet spokesmen would claim. It is rather an instrument of a much broader integrationist program design to entrap and keep Eastern Europe in the socialist web.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. INTRODUCTION--------------------------------------- 8

II. BACKGROUND, ORIGIN AND EARLY STRUCTURE OF THE WARSAW PACT--------------------------------------- 16
   A. BACKGROUND------------------------------------ 16
   B. ORIGIN---------------------------------------- 30
   C. EARLY STRUCTURE------------------------------- 37

III. MILITARY ASPECTS OF SOVIET POLICY IN THE WARSAW PACT--------------------------------------- 48
   A. STALIN: 1947-1956---------------------------- 48
   B. KHRUSHCHEV: 1956-1968------------------------ 62
   C. BREZHNEV: 1968- -------------------------- 84

IV. POLITICAL ASPECTS OF SOVIET POLICY IN THE WARSAW PACT--------------------------------------- 98
   A. ERA OF VIABILITY: 1956-1968------------------ 98
   B. ERA OF COHESION: 1968- ------------------- 126

V. CONCLUSIONS------------------------------------- 148

APPENDIX A THE WARSAW TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COOPERATION AND MUTUAL ASSISTANCE------ 161

APPENDIX B SOVIET-EAST EUROPEAN BI-LATERAL TREATY SYSTEM--------------------------- 164

LIST OF REFERENCES-------------------------------------- 165

BIBLIOGRAPHY------------------------------------------- 171

INITIAL DISTRIBUTION LIST------------------------------ 175
One should know one's enemies, their alliances, their resources and nature of their country, in order to plan a campaign.

-- Frederick the Great

Instructions for His Generals, 1747
I. INTRODUCTION

The geo-political mise-en-scene of Eastern Europe has had wide ranging implications for international stability throughout history. The bifurcated nature of today's European system is a result of a continuing struggle for political, social and economic order. Given the historic significance and the present and future implications of this process in Eastern Europe, it would be reasonable to focus on any number of issues in the East European arena. Specifically, it is my intention to focus on the military-political relationship between the Soviet Union and the Communist States of Eastern Europe as personified in the structure and function of Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact.

If we are to use this or any other analysis as a tool to explain or predict Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact, then we must first seek to acquire the "proper" perspective. I have enclosed the following vignette to illustrate the significance of an observer's orientation in analyzing a situation:

When a lawyer in Illinois, Abraham Lincoln was involved in cross examining a witness on his perceptions of an event:
"How many legs does a cow have?" asked Lincoln.
"Four."
"If you called the cow's tail a fifth leg, then how many legs would a cow have."
"Five," said the witness.
"Wrong," replied Lincoln, "Whatever you call it, it's still a tail to the cow."

A major problem in attempting to analyze Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact or elsewhere is that too many Western observers are calling the tail a leg. The Soviet view is somehow easily discarded in favor of a strictly Western orientation. Therefore, any reasonable study of Soviet policy must view the issues equally in a Western and Soviet framework. Such an orientation will help to clarify the evolution of Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact in terms of much broader Soviet goals and objectives. To couch our analysis of the Pact in strictly Western terms would, I believe, skew our understanding of Soviet methods.

The Soviet view is in reality a curious mix of Communist theology and Imperial Russian culture. Its orientation is based on a complex set of Marxist-Leninist principles which disguise a heritage of harsh social, economic and political realities. The Soviet view rejects the enlightened philosophy, democracy and individualism of the Western experience and embraces the xenophobia, anti-intellectualism and anti-democratic traditions of old Moscow. The unique cultural milieu of the peasant village and the Tsarist court were not swept aside by revolution, but continued in a new form. Authority remained absolute and centralized. Individual rights and democratic processes were not internalized. The new leadership regarded only self-preservation as the social and political norm. Though the forms of Imperial Russia were cast aside in violent upheaval, its substance remained intact. It is therefore absolutely essential to understanding the Soviet view to recognize that the patterns of old Russia which persists in the Soviet system today.
Historic, geographic and cultural factors alone would be sufficient to legitimize the subjugation of Eastern Europe in the Soviet mind. Russian interests in this area are rooted in several hundred years of political, social and economic interaction. The northern plain of Eastern Europe (and in particular Poland), has been the traditional invasion corridor from the West to Russia. Catholic Poland had been the ancient enemy of Orthodox Russia, and the two waged wars over the centuries, with Poland generally having the upper hand from the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries. Four great attempts to conquer Russia came from or through Poland: the Polish capture of the Kremlin in 1610; the invasion by Sweden's King Charles XII in 1709; the invasion of Napoleo's Grand Army in 1812; and Hitler's invasion in 1941. Russia has traditionally viewed the existence of a strong, independent neighbor as a threat to her security. Thus, she has played a role in the several major partitions of Poland: in 1772; 1793; 1795; and 1939. [1] It is against this historic tradition that the Soviet mind links Russian security to the East European Communist States which compose the northern tier of the Warsaw Pact.

The Balkan Peninsula, as a result of the centuries-long collapse of the Ottoman Empire, was and remains one of the greatest sources of international conflict in the modern era. The "Eastern Question" engendered on the one hand by the crisis of the Ottoman Empire, and on the other by increased colonial expansion into the Near East, was marked by several distinct periods. The first phase covered the period from the end of the eighteenth century to the Crimean War, and was marked primarily by the dominant role played by the Russian Empire in securing a foothold in the Near East and a right of access to the Black Sea. Despite the expansionist objectives the Tsar pursued with respect to the Ottoman Empire, the victories won over the Turks by Russian armed forces in this period had consequences that were historically progressive, inasmuch as this process established a number of independent states in the Balkans.

Russia's expansionist interests soon collided with the similar interests of the other great European powers. In this second period of the "Eastern Question", which opened with the Crimean War of 1853-1856 and closed with the end of the nineteenth century, Great Britain, France and Austria-Hungary increased their interest in the Ottoman Empire as a source of raw materials and as a market for industrial goods. These imperial policies of the Western European countries, which took from Turkey its border territories, were camouflaged by the principles of preserving the "status quo", the "integrity" of the Ottoman Empire, and the "balance of power" in Europe, but had as their goal the diminuation of Russian influence in the area and the closing of the Black Sea Straits to Russian warships. In this middle phase, the desires of Austria-Hungary to achieve economic and political hegemony in the Balkan region crossed the expansionist paths of Imperial Russia and greatly increased Austro-Russian antagonisms.
The third phase of the "Eastern Question" was marked by Germany's impetuous expansion into the Near East, with the intention of squeezing out the other great powers. The building of the Baghdad Railroad and the subordination of Turkish ruling circles to the military and political influence of Germany brought the Kaiser to predominance in an area already froth with tension. The increased conflict over the "Eastern Question" during the final era of European Imperialism was occasioned by the further decline of the Ottoman Empire, resulting in the growth and diffusion of national liberation movements among the peoples subject to the rule of the Turkish Sultan. [2] In this phase of the "Eastern Question", the stage was set for the events of the early twentieth century which led to the Great War in Europe and eventually to the birth of the Soviet State. In a very general sense, Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact may be seen as a permanent solution to the "Eastern Question" in which Russia has realized some of its earliest aspirations. At the very least, these north/south concerns of Imperial Russia, which led to a bifurcated policy with regards to Eastern Europe, may be the underlying framework which translated into a similarly divided Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact. Over the past twenty-five years, the Soviet Union has taken a markedly different view of events in the Northern tier (composed of East Germany, Poland, and Czechoslovakia) as opposed to similar events in the Southern tier of the Warsaw Pact (composed of the Balkan States).
Before moving directly to the details of Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact, it will be important to our understanding of that policy to indulge in a brief measure of postwar Soviet military doctrine. There are four points I should like to entertain. First, Marxism/Leninism casts international relations in terms of the dialectic, and therefore as inevitably conflictual. Familiar static concepts (such as "status quo" and "coexistence"), are not really part of the Marxist vocabulary. Thus, the Soviet Union has always taken the possibility of war with the West very seriously and while its assessment as to the likelihood of this inevitable conflict has varied over time, the Soviet leadership has never wavered in its belief that a strong military capability was necessary.

The second point is that Soviet military doctrine does not separate the idea of "nuclear deterrence" from the more general concept of defense. The defense of the Soviet Union rests upon the capability to repel, or at least, to absorb any attack and then go on to win the subsequent war. The Soviets obviously hope that their military capability will dissuade any aggressor, which is of course deterrence in its traditional sense. However, the crucial distinction between this and the Western concept of strategic deterrence is that should war come, Soviet deterrence will only have failed if their armed forces are unable to recover and go on to final victory. The Soviets do not entertain the notion that if war breaks out, then deterrence has necessarily failed. The emphasis on defense through a war-fighting capability therefore is central to Soviet military doctrine.

Third, a readiness to think through the implications of a nuclear war does not imply that the Soviet Union would recklessly embark on such a war with the West. Marxist/Leninist theory instructs that the initiation of war as a deliberate policy can only be justified if: (a) victory is virtually certain; and (b) the gains clearly outweigh the losses. In a major war with the Western powers, defeat for the Soviet Union would be synonymous with the extinction of the socialist system. It is the catastrophic consequences of defeat which motivates the Soviet Union to achieve higher levels of readiness and military superiority despite the rather contrived nature of the "capitalist threat".

Lastly, Soviet military doctrine is based on two important sets of objectives. The first focuses on extirpating the capitalist system by such measures as destroying its forces, its war-making potential, and its political structure. The second set focuses on preserving the socialist system which, besides protecting the socialist structure of government, must also aim to secure a sufficient economic base from which to build the world socialist order. The implications of these dual sets of objectives directly bear on Soviet force levels, inventories, military strategy, and tactics. Most important, this rather loose outline of Soviet military doctrine represents a continuity of thought and purpose which spans the postwar period with the exception of the short but significant wiggle introduced by Khrushchev in the early 1960's. [3]

The Soviet view of international relations, and particularly alliances, is thus a complex product of their past, present, and importantly, their future. Their belief in the dynamic nature of reality and in the inevitable outcome of natural political processes has placed the Soviet mind in an ideological bondage. This intellectual inflexibility causes them to perceive things as they should be and not as they are. The social, political, and economic realities of Eastern Europe are viewed in this peculiar manner. Their policy in regards to the Warsaw Pact is thus defined in terms of a socialist utopia which, though not fully operational, will nevertheless be realized. This inconsistency is translated into actions which often defy Western understanding. Without a thorough understanding of Russian culture, Russian/East European history, and Marxist/Leninist theology, we are easily led to simplistic solutions and explanations which "mirror-image" our own experiences and perspectives. This introduction has been designed, at the very least, to make the reader aware of these pitfalls when attempting to understand Soviet policy in any sphere.
II. BACKGROUND, ORIGIN AND EARLY STRUCTURE OF THE WARSAW PACT

A. BACKGROUND

The relationship between the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe which emerged after the Second World War was shaped by the complex factors discussed briefly in the introductory chapter. History, geography, culture, religion and ideology have, as suggested, played a role in shaping both the direction and configuration of this relationship. These factors, however, have impacted Soviet relations with the individual countries of Eastern Europe in uneven and changing proportions, contributing to the discontinuities evident in Soviet policies and actions throughout the postwar period. Some of these factors have served to bind the countries of Eastern Europe to the Soviet Union while others have served to alienate them. Indeed, while history and geography alone may sufficiently explain the subjugation of Eastern Europe by the Soviet Union after World War II, the specific character and form of the subjugation suggests that other factors have been equally influential. Soviet-East European relations owe part of their character to the broader history of relations between the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) and the World Communist movement, of which the pre-war Eastern European Communist parties were an integral part.
The history of Soviet relationships, first with foreign Communist parties, then with Communist states, and then with rivals for leadership (China), has been determined by two contradictory purposes: (1) serving the interests of the world socialist movement; or (2) serving the State interests of the Soviet Union. The first purpose is essentially self-abnegative, since it demands that the interests of the Soviet State be subordinated to extranational interests, while the second subverts socialist internationalism. Inevitably, tensions between these two conflicting purposes were difficult to resolve. Either the Soviet State was to become an expendable instrument of the international proletariat, or the Communist movement would be reduced to a creature responsive to the demands of the Soviet State. This dilemma was not surprisingly resolved by adjusting the interests of the movement and foreign Communist parties to those of the Soviet Union. Thus from 1928 to 1953, under Stalin, foreign Communist parties, even after assuming power in their own countries, remained instruments of Soviet control. [1]

With the installation of Communist regimes in the countries of Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union was forced to share the Socialist spotlight. The Soviet Union could no longer claim to articulate the class interests of the world proletariat languishing in oppression and exploitation in capitalist countries. As long as the Soviet Union was the sole Communist State, it could rationalize that, as the only country ruled by the proletariat, class interests dictated highest loyalty to the base and center of the world revolutionary movement. This loyalty was not founded on the inherent moral superiority or the priority of interests of the Soviet proletariat, but was simply a function of historical fortuity. This universal loyalty was dubbed "proletarian internationalism" and was based on the pretense that the Soviet Union was the main representative of the class interests of proletarians in all countries.

Proletarian internationalism set the tone for the relationships that developed between the Soviet Union and the "liberated" countries of Eastern Europe in the postwar period. It became, in effect, a device for converting party subservience into state vassalage. The East European countries were subjugated and their interests were subordinated to those of their Russian mentors. Some satellite leaders, however, rejected the Stalinist theory of "international proletarianism" and interpreted it as applicable only to parties in capitalist countries, noting that, otherwise it became a philosophical justification for Soviet colonialism. [2] The refusal of Yugoslavia's Tito among other anti-Stalinist East European leaders to place the interests of the Soviet State above those of their own countries, and to act as subservient agents in the face of Moscow's economic plunder and exploitation, resulted in Tito's expulsion and the wholesale liquidation of the other dissident leaders. Tito's defection in 1948-1949 marks the birth of "national Communism" and the beginning of a progressive erosion of Soviet primacy in Eastern Europe.
Among the immediate consequences of World War II, which significantly shaped the postwar international environment, was the penetration of Soviet military power into Eastern Europe. As Stalin said in April, 1945, "This war is not as in the past; whoever occupies a territory imposes on it his own social system. Everyone imposes his own social system as far as his army can reach. It cannot be otherwise." [3] In the postwar period, as the Soviet Union consolidated its share of the victory over Germany, it became apparent that this prescription was indeed put to work. Besides the task of securing the Soviet position in occupied Germany, the Soviet armed forces were used to secure other parts of Eastern Europe in preparation for their subsequent forced entry into the world socialist order. Unfortunately, at war's end, the Western Allies were in no mood to contemplate dislodging the Soviet forces, and for all practical purposes, acquiesced early in the period to Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe. ¹ Moreover, the Allies had largely demobilized their wartime forces within the first year or so after the war.

¹As early as the Tehran Conference in 1943, the Western Allies apparently gave Stalin the impression that he would have a free hand in Eastern Europe. This notion was later reinforced by Churchill's celebrated "spheres of influence" conversation with Stalin in October 1944. There is still a great deal of ambiguity, which competing interpretations have not resolved, as to the extent which the West, during the war, accepted a future Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe. [4]
In the fullness of time, history may provide answers to all the problems it poses, but it does not reveal much about the possible outcome of lost opportunities. One such lost opportunity was doubtless the failure of the Soviet Union and the West to establish a mutually acceptable relationship in the postwar period. If there is little point in speculating on what might have been, it is appropriate to note that in the first several years after World War II, Stalin chose a policy which not only prejudiced the possibility of postwar collaboration with the Western Allies, but which also served to unite them in opposition to his aims. Certainly Western attitudes and statesmanship also contributed to the breakdown of wartime unity, which helped give rise to what became the Cold War, but to recognize this is not embrace the notion that Stalin stands in the eyes of history as the injured party.

Given the rapid demobilization of Western forces immediately following the war, it would seem that relatively modest Soviet forces would have been sufficient to safeguard Soviet gains and to shield the processes of socialism in Eastern Europe. However, Stalin chose to keep very substantial forces in place in occupied Germany and elsewhere in Eastern Europe. Numbering close to thirty divisions and nearly a half-million men, this Soviet force loomed formidably against the fewer than ten loosely coordinated British, French and American divisions that garrisoned Western Europe in those early years (1945-1948). It was the visible Soviet military presence in Eastern Europe, backed by substantial forces in the bordering territory of the USSR itself, which initially gave rise to serious concern in the West that this "imbalance of forces" might prejudice the post-war security of Europe. [5]

Many interpretations of Stalin's motives have been offered, and most tend to fall into two categories: (1) those stressing his desire to exploit the postwar situation in order to make positive gains for Soviet policy; and (2) those emphasizing his concerns for Soviet security. In the first case, it is held that Stalin, sensing that the floodgates of social and political upheaval opened by the defeat of Germany would not remain open forever, decided to make the most of this opportunity to advance the revolution, even at the cost of alienating his wartime allies. The collapse of Germany had left a power vacuum in the heart of Europe which Stalin was cynically prepared to fill, the main restriction upon his aggressive urge being "the limits of an amiable indulgence of the Western powers". In the second category, by contrast, Stalin is said to have been primarily concerned with fending off anticipated efforts by the Western powers to undo his wartime gains and therefore sought to forestall them by consolidating Soviet control over the territories occupied by the Red Army. Certainly these, as well as other elements entered into Stalin's postwar perceptions of the East European scene, as he seemed "bent upon squandering the reservoir of good will" he had inherited from the wartime years. It is unclear whether his expansionist aims were disguised as security guarantees or that, in fact, he understood there to be little difference between the extension of Communist rule and the enhancement of Soviet security. In any case, without belaboring all the possible sources of Stalin's motivation, it is clear that Soviet security and Soviet expansion had some bearing upon his policy toward Eastern Europe in this period. [6]

In 1945, the defeat of Germany had left the Soviet Union virtually unchallenged in Eastern Europe, where it was Stalin's task to translate the Soviet Union's new position of influence into practical political arrangements. In Stalin's view, "friendly" East European states bordering the Soviet Union were necessary to ensure a "fundamental" security for the Soviet State, and only countries with Communist regimes could be regarded as safe and dependable friends. Whether he envisaged East Europe as part of a Soviet-dominated interstate system, or its absorption into the Soviet State itself is not clear, he was apparently satisfied to allow the neighboring Communist states to remain outside the federative framework of the Soviet Union, unlike his previous treatment of the Baltic States. During the first several years after the war he was content to gradually close off Eastern Europe from Western influence and to set in motion a transitional stage of takeover. This transitional policy, favored by Stalin, was marked by such measures as exacting economic reparations, the establishment of mixed-stock companies favoring Soviet economic penetration of the region, and the installation of a legal basis for the "liquidation of political opposition" through the formation of "constitutional" regimes known as "People's Democracies".

The turning point of Stalin's postwar policy in Eastern Europe came in 1947, coincident with the founding of the Cominform and the launching of the "Zhdanovshchina," when the transitional process of Sovietization of the East European countries was greatly speeded up. At this time, emphasis was laid upon the "debt" of Eastern Europe to the "liberating" armies of the Soviet Union to which the Communist regimes owed their existence. However, despite the pressures of Stalin's attempt at political coordination in Eastern Europe, this harsher phase of Soviet policy (the Zhdanovshchina) tended to create its own liabilities. Nationalist sentiments in Eastern Europe were reawakened by the obtrusive character of Russian control.
A sense of East European regionalism found expression in such proposals as Tito's for a closer bond between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, with its implication of a wider East European federation. Stalin's well-known effort to bring Tito into line collapsed in 1948, but he was somewhat more successful in suppressing "polycentric" tendencies in the other satellite regimes by purging the leaderships. (Patrascana of Rumania, Gomulka of Poland, Rajk of Hungary, Clementis of Czechoslovakia, and Kostov of Bulgaria).

Paralleling Stalin's tightening of political control in Eastern Europe and his elimination of deviationist elites among the various national party cadres was the initiation of a new program to institutionalize Soviet influence in the economic sphere. This took the form of the establishment in 1949 of the Council for Economic Mutual Assistance, (CEMA or Comecon), and although presumably intended to provide for the bloc-wide pooling of resources and the division of labor integrated with Soviet economic plans, it functioned less as an instrument of economic integration than as a device for conducting an economic boycott of Yugoslavia.[7] For the most part, Stalin preferred to continue direct "bilateral" economic relations with the various satellite countries.

Similarly, in the sphere of security arrangements with the East European satellites, Stalin preferred to keep things on a bilateral basis. Beginning in 1948, the Soviets concluded a series of bilateral treaties with several East European countries, pledging mutual assistance in the event of "aggression from without." These treaties were followed by a number of similar bilateral arrangements among the states of Eastern Europe themselves (see Appendix B). With respect to the armed forces of the East European satellites, Stalin's policy in the early years was aimed largely at eliminating personnel whose loyalties were suspect, and only much later did he begin to give attention to building up the military capabilities of the satellite forces.

On the whole, Stalin's policy toward Eastern Europe between 1945 and 1953 could be judged a good deal more successful than Soviet policy toward Western Europe in the same period. However, not far beneath the surface, issues and forces were stirring with which the methods of Stalinism were to prove inadequate to cope after Stalin himself was gone. National pride, popular resentment toward Soviet economic exploitation, fears among party cadres for their personal security and dissatisfaction with the degeneration of "party life", and a growing doubt that doctrinaire Soviet methods and Soviet experience were relevant models for the societies of Eastern Europe -- these among other factors combined to generate mounting pressure against the lid which Stalin had clamped down upon the life of Eastern Europe. These smoldering problems of Eastern Europe ignited during the early years of the Warsaw Pact.

Of all the aspects of Stalin's policies which contributed to keeping Cold War anxieties alive, it was Stalin's latter-days approach to the question of Germany which proved to be least reassuring. Though Stalin's thinking by this time had backed away somewhat from the "two hostile camps" concept of the "Zhdanovshchina," his post 1948 approach to the German question did little to convey a benign image of Soviet intentions. Rather, it came to be seen as the prescription for a policy aimed at provoking discord among the Western countries who had welcomed a defeated Germany into their midst. [8] That Germany should be very much at the center of Soviet thinking was not surprising, the prospect of German recovery and the direction in which a resurgent Germany might turn its energies could scarcely fail to be of concern to them. Therefore, there is no reason to suppose that Stalin took lightly the possibility that Germany might prove to be the catalyst of a new war into which the Soviet Union could be drawn. Perhaps Stalin believed that the trouble-making potential of a resurgent Germany could be turned against the West by an adroit Soviet diplomacy or, alternatively, he may have counted upon finding an approach to the German question which would neutralize Germany and perhaps give the Soviet Union a controlling hand in German affairs.

That Stalin may even have been prepared to reverse an earlier preference for a divided Germany in order to find a more plausible solution to the German problem is suggested by the controversial Soviet proposal of March 1953. In this proposal, Stalin dropped his previous insistence on a totally disarmed Germany, and raised the prospect of unification in return for German neutralization and the liquidation of foreign military bases on German soil. Some seven months of diplomatic maneuvering between Moscow and the West followed the Soviet overture, with the West accusing the Soviet government of dodging the question of free elections, while the Soviets charged that the issue of free elections was only intended to divert discussion from the substantive issues of the Soviet proposal. Ultimately, the result was that the West declined to negotiate, tending to regard Stalin's proposal primarily as a maneuver or "delaying bid" to forestall the ratification of the European Defense
Although this view was challenged by some Western critics, and labeled as a "lost opportunity", there is every reason to believe that Stalin was seeking a tactical device to delay, or if possible forestall, implementation of the EDC, under which West Germany would have taken a first major step toward participation in the Western defense system. That Stalin may have been prepared to bargain seriously over German reunification is by no means incompatible with his notion of a unified Germany drawn politically into the Soviet orbit. On

2 The European Defense Community (EDC) was an abortive attempt by the West European powers to form a supranational European army. The idea was originally rooted at the Hague Conference of 1948. Later, Rene Pleven, twice the French Premier, evolved a plan that was put forward by French Foreign Minister Robert Schuman at a meeting of the Council of Europe in 1951. Under the EDC concept, a united West Europe would form a wholly integrated armed force to counterbalance the overwhelming conventional military ascendancy of the Soviet Union. The EDC Treaty was concluded in Paris in 1954.

Though the French were divided on the EDC issue, they were attracted by the idea of diluting West Germany's future military potential through such a supranational arrangement. Those Frenchmen who favored the EDC realized that Great Britain would also have to join, otherwise the dispersal of French armed forces in Indochina and North Africa would have implied German ascendancy within the force. Britain, however, as a result of its lingering isolationism, was reluctant to sacrifice British sovereignty to European integration. Nevertheless, when it was clear that the EDC would not be ratified by the French National Assembly (August, 1954), Britain's Anthony Eden took the lead to rectify the situation by calling for a nine-power conference at which he put forward a considerably modified scheme involving a higher degree of cooperation between separate national armies under the Brussels Treaty Council. Consequently, A Western European Unity Treaty (of 50 years term) was signed, and the Western European Union (WEU) was set up in 1955. Military cooperation, however, continued to be coordinated primarily within the NATO organization, to which West Germany was admitted in 1955, providing the raison-de-etre for the Warsaw Treaty Organization.
the other hand, the fact that a new forced-draft program for the "construction of socialism" in East Germany was adopted in July 1952, even though an exchange of notes on Stalin's March proposal was still underway, may indicate that Stalin had never really expected his reunification offer to bear fruit. The burden of any criticism, (similar criticism was extended to the Western reaction to Soviet negotiating initiatives in 1954 and 1955 when the Paris agreements involving West Germany's participation in NATO and the Western European Union (WEU) were waiting ratification), comes down to the point that, since the West failed to test Stalin's proposal through the negotiations, it must remain a question whether any real "opportunity" for resolving German unification was lost. [9]

The era of Stalinist hegemony -- lasting until the mid-1950's -- was characterized by a certain simplicity, in that the Soviet Union issued instructions and directions to the leaders of Eastern Europe, who, in turn, implemented them. The satellites diligently took their cues from Moscow, so that differences between Soviet and Eastern European political patterns and priorities were not a matter of substance. The only exception was Yugoslavia's Tito, who, as a result of his independent national political course, was condemned as a deviationist. The Stalinist phase in Soviet-East European relations was an era of Soviet triumph as the Soviet Union demonstrated the utility and applicability of its own model of socialism. It was an era of military promise because the Soviet Union had fulfilled its historic ambition by erecting a buffer zone on its western frontiers. Finally, the Stalinist phase in Eastern Europe offered economic benefits to the Soviet Union in the form of extensive reparations and through imposed and eminently unfair trade agreements.

On the other hand, the events of the postwar Stalin period demonstrated that this approach was too domineering to serve Soviet interests. The "anti-Tito" purges instilled widespread fear and left a residue of considerable elite tensions. The imposition of collectivization resulted in an agricultural crisis throughout the region, and the exploitation of the East European economies proved to be counterproductive. The East Berlin riots of 1953, the dramatic Polish events in 1956, and especially the Hungarian revolt of that same year, clearly suggested to the Soviet leadership that Stalin's conception of Soviet-East European relations had to give way to a less imperious relationship.

When Stalin died in March, 1953, his successors could not have failed to realize that the satellites were becoming increasingly political, economic and military burdens as much as assets. [10] Their first task was clearly to get the countries of Eastern Europe moving again under appropriate Soviet direction, with some reasonable degree of coordination of policies in foreign and domestic affairs. However, the new leadership was quickly embroiled in a succession crisis which unleashed internal divisions within the Kremlin, which, in turn, created opportunities for self-expression among the vassal states. The more inconclusive the struggle in Moscow, the greater the apprehension in Eastern Europe. Surviving anti-Stalinists in satellite countries were emboldened to surface and to directly challenge the system. Soviet-modeled institutions were, in many ways, dissolved or modified, while Soviet-type ideological controls over the arts, sciences and media were renounced in accordance with local demands, even the Cominform itself was abolished in response to these demands. [11]

As the succession controversy became more acute, Kremlin factions reached out into their East European empire for incremental support. The divisive and corrosive factional squabbles in the Kremlin all combined to undermine Soviet prestige and authority in the socialist sphere. The uncertainty and hesitation in Moscow in the wake of Stalin's death encouraged arrogance in Peking, insolence in Belgrade, and dissidence in Eastern Europe. Against this backdrop of internal intrigue, external dissent, and extreme East-West tensions, the Warsaw Pact emerged as an instrument of post-Stalin Soviet policy.

B. ORIGIN

On the whole, Stalin's passing did not basically affect the priority he had assigned to the development of Soviet economic and military power, nor did it change the Soviet Union's Cold War objectives in Europe with respect to the neutralization of Germany and the blocking of a further buildup of Western defenses. His demise did, however, open the way for innovations in the style and manner by which these objectives were to be pursued. There is no universal agreement with the view that Stalin's death caused only a "shift in factors" leading to the employment of more subtle and flexible means of control throughout the Soviet empire. Suffice it to say that, while deep-seated forces of change may have been awakened in Soviet society by Stalin's passing, the post-Stalin leadership was more concerned with new tactics relative to Stalin's old objectives. [12]

Some signs of a new flexibility in the conduct of Soviet policy began to appear even before the transitional succession struggle was resolved in Nikita Khrushchev's favor. In a series of proposals in 1954 and early 1955, various alternative plans for an all-European collective security system were linked with suggestions for a settlement of the German question. The first set of these proposals was advanced by Molotov at the Council of Foreign Ministers Conference at Berlin in January-February 1954, which had been convened to deal with the question of peace treaties for Germany and Austria. He proposed a collective security system embracing both West and East European states, but which tentatively excluded the United States and the PRC. On the German question, Molotov proposed that German unification be effected under a coalition government giving equal status to the Bonn government and to the East German Communist regime. Like the earlier meetings of the Council of Ministers in Stalin's day, this conference ended without East-West agreement. 3
In the months that followed this fruitless meeting, while the EDC treaty debate raged in West European capitals, Soviet diplomacy offered several modified proposals linking a German peace settlement with a conference on European security. One of these, offered in a Soviet note of March 31, 1954, suggested that NATO be widened to include the Soviet Union and the East European Communist states. The West's refusal to act on this proposal was later taken as proof of NATO's aggressive military posture. The rejection of the EDC treaty by the French Assembly in August 1954 brought momentary satisfaction in Moscow, however, the speedy conclusion of the Paris Agreements less than two months later, which were taken to surmount the French failure to ratify the EDC, renewed Soviet anxiety over West German participation in Western defense arrangements. Since the Paris accords of October 1954 were not to go into effect until May 1955, Soviet diplomacy devoted itself in the interim to discourage their implementation. Soviet efforts took many forms, including threats to abrogate the Anglo-Soviet and Franco-Soviet treaties of 1942 and 1944, and a new series of proposals for conferences on collective security and German reunification. The first of 3The last notable attempt during Stalin's regime to reach a treaty settlement on Germany in these joint negotiations was in June, 1949 at the sixth session of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris. When Vysninckii sought to restore the principle of four-power control over the whole of Germany. [13]

these proposals, calling in October 1954 for a four power conference in the following month on German reunification and the creation of a collective security system, was quickly followed by other similar proposals in November and December, 1954, and January and February, 1955. In a note directed against the ratification of the Paris Agreements, sent on November 13, 1954 to the governments of the other twenty three European States and to the United States, the Soviets condemned the ressurection of German militarism and warned that German unity would be sacrificed by including West Germany in the Western security system.

"The plans drawn up at the London and Paris Conferences for the ressurecting of German militarism and incorporating the remilitarized Germany in military alignments cannot but complicate the situation in Europe ... It will therefore be natural if the peace-loving European nations find themselves obliged to adopt new measures for safeguarding their security." [14]

In late November, 1954, the Soviets convened a "European Security Conference" in Moscow which was attended only by countries of the socialist bloc, and announced at the close of the conference on December 2, 1954, that the bloc would "take common measures for the organization of armed forces and their commands" in the event the Western powers ratified the Paris Agreements. Most significantly, in its last-ditch campaign against the Paris Agreements, the Soviet Union shifted its position on the vexing issue of German elections, indicating that it was prepared to discuss the "holding of free all-German elections" providing the West would refrain from ratifying the Paris Agreements. Thus, as in Stalin's March, 1952 reunification proposal, the Soviet Union again called for the West to abandon its NATO concept of common defense as the price for a peace treaty that would settle the future status of Germany.

Despite Soviet pronouncements and proposals, the West declined to dismantle its security structure and went ahead with the Paris Agreements, ratifying them on May 5, 1955. Despite this major setback, which certainly contributed to Bulganin's demise, Soviet diplomacy in Europe took several new paths under the emergent leadership of Khrushchev.4

It soon became apparent that Khrushchev's ebullient style was bringing a new vigor to the conduct of Soviet diplomacy when in the spring of 1955 the Soviet Union injected a fresh note into the European policy approach by reviving the long-stalled talks on Austria. The relative ease of these negotiations came as a pleasant surprise to Western participants, and the successful conclusion of the Austrian State Treaty on May 15, 1955 sparked new hopes for detente in Europe. Under the terms of the treaty, the Soviet Union, in return for Austrian neutrality, 4At which point in time Khrushchev achieved dominance over Soviet foreign policy is not clear. He was probably well on the way toward it by the end of 1954, when he turned up in Peking as the Soviet leader to deal with Mao Tse Tung on the already delicate issue of Sino-Soviet relations. He probably did not gain undisputed control of Soviet foreign and domestic polity, until he had eliminated the so-called "anti-party group" in mid 1957. [15] gave up its forward military position in Central Europe, agreeing to withdraw its troops from Austrian territory. However, by giving up its occupied portion of Austria, the Soviet Union had created a 500 mile neutral wedge, splitting the Western defense area in two. As one astute observer put it, "What the Paris Agreements had joined together," not six months before, "the State Treaty, at least partly, put asunder." [16]

Simultaneously with the Austrian Treaty, however, the Soviet Union made another move which took the edge off any optimistic expectations rising in Europe. In an avowed response to West Germany's entry into NATO, (which occurred May 9, 1955), the Soviets annulled their treaties with Britain and France, and on May 11, 1955 convened the Conference for the Protection of Peace and the Security of Europe in Moscow. Three days later on May 14, 1955, just one day before signing the Austrian State Treaty, the Soviet Union and its East European satellites signed a pact creating the Warsaw Treaty Organization (WTO). This step marked the emergence of rival military alliance systems in postwar Europe. Although the Warsaw Treaty was at its inception largely a diplomatic countermeasure which brought little immediate change in the military or political condition of the Eastern bloc, it did have the incidental effect of providing a new legal basis for the preservation of Soviet military forces in Hungary and Rumania. Closely modeled on the North Atlantic Treaty, Soviet leaders considered the Warsaw Pact an alliance on an equal footing with NATO, accruing useful advantages for the Soviets in the United Nations as well as in other negotiating forums.

Apart from the German issue, the continuing struggle among Stalin's successors had wide repercussions for the Warsaw Pact. Much of the succession conflict had centered on differing views of the "correct" foreign policy. Within the Soviet Politburo, Khrushchev, Bulganin, Molotov and Voroshilov had been opposed to Malenkov. During his premiership, Malenkov had attempted to moderate Stalin's hard-line committing himself to detente and to the prevention of nuclear war. The anti-Malenkov group, however, viewed steps to reduce international tensions with suspicion, and considered the struggle to isolate capitalism more important than detente. Ultimately, though, it was the failure of Malenkov's domestic program which prompted his resignation in February, 1955. Having gained control of the leadership, Bulganin and Khrushchev moved further away from Stalin's hard-line approach to foreign relations, thereby isolating Molotov with still another similar cynical political tactic. This further emphasis on a "normalization" of relations was translated into Soviet concessions with respect to Austria, and an effort to reconcile Belgrade to Moscow. At the Warsaw Treaty Conference, Bulganin, who spoke for the Soviet government, stated that "the unalterable principle of Soviet foreign policy is Lenin's principle of coexistence of different social systems." Whereas earlier pronouncements had emphasized the aggressive nature of the Western powers, and specifically the threat to peace inherent in the Paris Agreements, Bulganin balanced his hostility toward the Paris Agreements and "aggressive military blocs" with conciliatory gestures stressing the Soviet commitment to peace. His references to the future East European members of the Warsaw Pact also contrasted with earlier categorical assertions. Bulganin stressed that the "consultations held by the participants" revealed a full unanimity of views concerning the need for a treaty of friendship and mutual assistance. He added:

"The relations between our countries are an embodiment of the noble principles of socialist internationalism, of the noble idea of fraternal friendship between free and equal Nations." [17]

C. EARLY STRUCTURE

The language of the Warsaw Treaty itself, while similar to its NATO counterpart, reflected the international priorities of the Bulganin-Khrushchev leadership. The treaty consisted of eleven articles (see Appendix A) defining the member states relationships to one another, (particularly in the event of aggression) to the United Nations and to non-member states. Basing the treaty on the "principle of respect for the independence and sovereignty of others and noninterference in internal affairs," (article 8) the members agreed: (1) to settle all disputes peacefully (article 1); (2) to consult on all international issues affecting their common interest; (3) to consult immediately in the event that one of the signators were threatened with armed attack (article 3); (4) to establish a joint command (article 5) and a political consultative committee

37
(article 6); and (5) to promote the economic and cultural intercourse within the group (article 8). With regard to the United Nations, the treaty specified that it was in accordance with the UN charter (article 1) and that measures of joint defense would be taken under article 51 of the UN charter (article 4). As for non-member states, all "European" states were invited to join the treaty if they agreed with its aims "irrespective of their social and political systems" (article 9). In hailing the Warsaw Treaty as a new benchmark in international relations, the Soviets pointed to this clause and contrasted NATO's rejection of the USSR's request for membership in March 1954. Nevertheless, membership was limited to the Soviet Union and the East European Communist states, suggesting that Moscow considers ideological compatibility a prerequisite for maintaining a workable arrangement. The treaty partners agreed to take part in international activities designed to safeguard the peace (article 2), but conversely agreed not to join any coalition or alliance, or make an agreement in conflict with the WTO (article 7). The treaty was to have an initial duration of twenty years, contingent on the realization of a general European treaty of

---

5 Both the North Atlantic Treaty and the Warsaw Pact refer specifically to article 51 rather than to the articles of the UN charter concerned with regional arrangements. Article 51 is not part of the chapter devoted to regional arrangements, nor is it considered to refer to regional arrangements. The situation here was that neither the Soviet nor Allied policymakers wanted their organizations to be subject to the authority of the UN Security Council as are regional organizations according to article 53 of the UN charter. [18] collective security, with automatic prolongation unless one year's notice of withdrawal was given. [19]

Unlike NATO, the political and military organization of the Warsaw Pact has never been made public in any detail. Its constituent commissions and advisory bodies are referred to in the Soviet press infrequently and without insightful specificity. Little is known of the institutional structure set up by the Warsaw Treaty. The treaty itself referred only to a Political Consultative Committee with the power to appoint auxiliary bodies. Further organizational details were worked out in a closed session during the January 1956 Political Consultative Committee (PCC) meeting. At that time two auxiliary institutions were created: (1) a standing commission to work out recommendations on questions of foreign policy; and (2) a joint secretariat which was to be staffed by representatives of all treaty members. The PCC also decided during this first session that it should meet not less than twice a year thereafter with the chairmanship of future meetings rotating among the members. From 1956 until recently, organizational decisions among treaty members were not made public, nor has there been any further mention of the activities of either the Standing Policy Commission or the Joint Secretariat. (Further structural changes were made in the aftermath of the 1968 Czech invasion. These issues will be discussed in chapters 3 and 4.)

In the military arena, the eight countries party to the Warsaw Treaty (Albania, one of the original members, opted out of the alliance in September, 1968) issued a "Resolution on the Formation of a Unified Command of Armed Forces." Under the Pact, a joint command of Soviet and East European armed forces was set up, with Soviet Marshal I. S. Konev as its first Commander-in-Chief. He was to be assisted by the ministers of defense of the other member states as deputy commanders-in-chief, who were to have charge of the armed forces contributed by their home states. A staff of the joint armed forces, including permanent members from the East European general staffs, was to be located in Moscow.

The Pact's first Chief of Staff, General A. I. Anitov, was also one of the two First Deputy Chiefs of the Soviet General Staff, and his WTO staff appeared to be an integral part of the Soviet Ministry of Defense. No further details of the Pact's early military organization are available. [20] Disposition of the joint forces on the territories of the member states was to be covered by separate agreements among the states as the "requirements of their mutual defense might indicate." This particular provision solved the immediate problem of justifying a continued occupation by Soviet forces of East European territory. This difficulty was overcome by including in the announcement of the establishment of the Warsaw Pact High Command the statement that the deployment of Soviet forces in Eastern Europe were being arranged in accordance with the mutual defense requirements of the states concerned.
On the heels of the founding of the Warsaw Pact, Soviet diplomacy took a further step forward stabilizing the European situation. In response to the changed Soviet attitude on the Austrian Treaty, President Eisenhower set aside the conditions he had established as prerequisites for a general European summit. In July, 1955, the Geneva Summit Conference was convened to discuss the problems of Europe, including German reunification, European security, disarmament, and means to improve East-West contacts. This conference, which grew in part out of the cordial atmosphere created by the Austrian settlement, afforded Khrushchev his first opportunity to deal face-to-face with the Western heads of government, though nominally he did not yet hold office. (Khrushchev did not succeed Bulganin as Premier until November, 1958.) Unfortunately, neither the "friendly exchange" at the Summit in July, nor the Ministerial Conference that followed in the fall (the Geneva Meeting of Foreign Ministers - October 27-November 16, 1955) yielded tangible progress on the problems of German reunification, European security, and disarmament. However, the atmosphere of detente which prevailed at the Geneva Conference, superficial though it may have appeared to some critics, was to persuade many people that the Cold War had passed its peak. Under the influence of the Geneva thaw and other developments of the mid-fifties -- the opening of East-West disarmament negotiations, the establishment of Soviet-West German diplomatic relations, and the denunciation of Stalin at the Twentieth Party Congress, among others -- sentiments grew in Western Europe that not only had the rigors of the Cold War subsided, but so had the Soviet military threat to Europe. [21]

From a political point of view, the Warsaw Pact -- despite its minimal structure -- had been an important prop for the Soviet strategy at Geneva. In a draft European Collective Security Treaty envisaged by the Soviet Union, the North Atlantic Treaty, the Paris Agreements, and the Warsaw Treaty would simultaneously cease to operate, to be replaced by an all-European collective security system. This was the Soviet Union's maximum goal, but one which the Soviets obviously did not expect to achieve at that time. Bulganin had hedged the suggestion by making the move contingent upon an agreement on armament reduction and the withdrawal of foreign troops from the territory of European countries. Obviously, the United States Congress could be counted on to refuse such an agreement. As noted, no concrete steps were taken at the Summit, and Bulganin's proposal was reserved for future consideration at the October Foreign Ministers Conference. At the close of the Geneva Summit Conference the Soviets published a Polish article which insisted that the results of the Summit indisputably proved the significance of the Warsaw Treaty. After this, further references to the Warsaw Treaty disappeared from the Soviet press until the first Political Consultative Committee meeting in January 1956. These facts, along with the lack of any reference to GDR membership in the Warsaw Treaty Organization, with the signing of the Soviet-East German Bilateral Treaty in September, 1955, support the presumption that, at least initially, the Warsaw Pact had a largely propagandistic significance relative to Soviet East-West maneuvering. [22]

In addition to the motivations rooted in Cold War intrigue, there were other very good political and military reasons for establishing some kind of organization in Eastern Europe through which the new Soviet leadership could adapt their own style to the system of control inherited from Stalin. The Soviet leaders needed a political organization through which they could continue to transmit directives to their East European allies and to organize East European support for Soviet policy objectives. Further, the Soviet government desired an agency that could provide a more efficient framework for controlling and administering the East European armies, navies, and air forces. Lastly, this organization had to at least give the appearance of being a forum in which East European views could be taken into account and thus help reduce the visible signs of Soviet domination.

The new Warsaw Pact also fulfilled important military requirements for the Soviets. The Khrushchev-Bulganin leadership recognized that Stalin's military policy towards Eastern Europe had been both primitive and wasteful. Primitive because Soviet army regulations had been imposed on the national armies down to the most trivial detail, because Soviet officers had been dispatched to key appointments and because the special privileges and rights reserved for Soviet officers were regarded as humiliating by their East European hosts. Stalin's policies were wasteful because he was reluctant to equip East European armies with anything but obsolete weapons, because no attempts were made to coordinate training under the existing bilateral defense treaties, because Stalin had relegated East European forces to the task of internal security, and lastly because Stalin clearly distrusted the national officer corps, which he frequently purged with characteristic ruthlessness. After Stalin's death, Soviet defense policy and requirements began to be reoriented in terms of nuclear weapons and postwar delivery and transport systems. As for the European "theater of operations," the new military doctrine required East European forces to play a part in the defense of the Soviet Union's western frontier. The Soviet leaders recognized that their European vassals could hardly be left out of a needed modernizing process, and should be re-equipped to assume a vital role in manning a "buffer zone" between their borders and the West. Forming the Warsaw Pact was, therefore, a logical step to effect the training, re-equipping and coordination of the East European forces under a new Soviet direction.

Eighteen months after the Pact was formed, in the fall of 1956, the emergent Geneva optimism was dealt a hard blow with virtually simultaneous crises in Eastern Europe and in the Middle East, both of which produced tensions at odds with the notion of a durable East-West détente. In the second case, East-West tensions rose sharply when the Soviet Union threatened to intervene militarily, hinting that Soviet rockets might be used against France and Britain as a result of their attack on Egypt in the Suez Crisis, even though the Soviet missile inventory was far too limited to lend much substance to Khrushchev's threats. [23] In the first case, a national anti-Soviet uprising swept Hungary, which during the Imre Nagy regime virtually destroyed the Communist system. Against the background of the Eisenhower-Dulles policy of "liberation," which in words called for the emancipation of Soviet dominated satellites, Nagy announced Hungary's unilateral withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact and enunciated a "neutralist" foreign policy. The Soviet response was both immediate and overwhelming. Without the benefit of consultation, a Soviet army from the Carpathian Military District invaded the country, (following the route used by the Russian Imperial Army, which suppressed the Hungarian uprising of 1849), overthrew the Nagy regime, and replaced it with a pro-Soviet leadership under Janos Kadar. Hungarian military and civilian resistance was crushed within a few days, and the deposed leaders were abducted, tried and executed on Soviet orders. The Hungarian Army was virtually disbanded, and it was not until the mid-1960's that Hungarian divisions once again joined the ranks of the Warsaw Pact forces. The swift suppression of the Hungarian revolt underscored Soviet readiness to unilaterally use force to keep Eastern Europe within the orthodox Communist fold. However, the brutal suppression of the Hungarian uprising compelled the Soviet leaders to make concessions elsewhere in Eastern Europe. Khrushchev's "tactics of recovery" from the Hungarian crisis included new status-of-forces agreements which in most cases favored the host countries.

Any attempt to understand behavior as an index of changing realities and attitudes must first be examined under the original set of conditions. Therefore, it was natural and necessary to start at or precede the beginning. In our case, the Soviet Union had already signed bilateral treaties of friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance with all the East European countries except East Germany and Albania. Why then, did the Soviets create a multilateral alliance such as the Warsaw Pact? In this second chapter, I have attempted to set down the relevant factors and events which prompted the Soviets to take such a move. Clearly, on the surface, the explanation is straightforward and correct, the Warsaw Treaty was rooted in deep Soviet and East European fears of a rearmed and revanchist Germany. Specifically it grew out of Moscow's campaign to prevent West German membership in the West European Union, and as a result, NATO. Additionally, the Soviets had hoped to edge United States armed forces off the continent, and American influence generally out of the European sphere by creating an all-European security system to outflank the Western defense. Although fear of a reviving German militarism provided the impetus for the Warsaw Pact, we know that Soviet internal developments strongly colored the Soviet perception of its utility. Evolving attitudes in Moscow and changing political processes in the European arena were the catalyst for inconsistent Soviet perceptions of its purpose. For Khrushchev, the importance of the Warsaw Pact focused outside itself; a reflection of his ambition for equal status with the West. For his purpose, the Pact was not intended to fight, but to gain position in the ideological struggle with the West. For others in the Kremlin, the Pact was a vehicle for socialist consolidation, military preparedness and defense. [24] Thus it is not strange that many and conflicting Soviet policies were evident in the early days of the Warsaw Treaty Organization and in Moscow's early analysis of its importance. Detente, defense of the Socialist Camp, disarmament, and threat of imperialist aggression were some of the conflicting themes which surfaced during the pitched, largely submerged struggle for political power which followed Stalin's death, and which dominated as aspects of political life in Europe. The Warsaw Pact, born of Cold War intrigue, and modeled on NATO, acquired substance largely in relation to Soviet policy toward Eastern Europe and the Socialist Commonwealth.
III. MILITARY ASPECTS OF SOVIET POLICY IN THE WARSAW PACT

A. STALIN: 1947-1956

The founding in 1955 of the Warsaw Treaty Organization as the formal multilateral security alliance of the states within the Soviet bloc was not principally a consequence of a Soviet desire to rationalize the East European armed forces. Externally, it was a political response to the incorporation of a remilitarized West Germany into the Western security system. Internally, the founding of the Pact represented a Soviet effort to establish a multilateral political organization, no matter how devoid of substance, that in concert with the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (Comecon), could provide an institutional substitute for the personalized Stalinist system of Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe.

Following Stalin's death, and with a partial easing of East-West tensions, the Soviet leadership sought to relax the most extreme forms of forced subservience to Soviet control in Eastern Europe -- essentials of the Stalinist interstate system that became Soviet liabilities with the removal of the system's personal linchpin. Economic considerations were brought to the fore in the Soviet effort to redress what was now considered Stalin's "misallocation" of military-related resources in Eastern Europe. Stalin's forced mobilization of East European armed forces had so overstretched the East European economies that the military burden had serious destabilizing political ramifications. While defense policy was not the sole factor causing East European dissent in the mid-1950's, it does represent one of several "miscalculations" on Stalin's part. As noted in the previous chapter, Stalin's military policy towards Eastern Europe had been both primitive and wasteful.

As Soviet military thought was freed of Stalin's traditional "permanent operating factors of war"\(^6\), Soviet defense policy and requirements were being redefined in the light of nuclear weapons and postwar improvements in means of delivery, transport, and speed of movement for the ground forces. Stalin had resisted doctrinal implications of the technical possibilities for greater mechanization and concentration of ground forces; these were now accepted and Soviet policy toward the East European armed forces was affected in turn. As far as the European theater of operations was concerned, the new Soviet military doctrine required that Soviet and East European forces play a part in the defense of the Soviet Union's "open" western frontier, by manning the "buffer zone" between the Soviet border and the West, by maintaining internal security and orthodox Communist parties in power, and, in the event of war, by advancing rapidly westward to destroy NATO forces and occupy NATO territory. The post-Stalin Soviet leaders realized that their East European allies could hardly be left out of this modernizing process, and in order that they should assume a role of real value to the Soviet army, their forces had to be reorganized, re-equipped, cut down to realistic strengths and provided with necessary mobility. Above all, their activity, training, and assignments had to be effectively coordinated under Soviet direction. The formation of some type of Soviet-East European command structure became a logical step for the new leadership to take in order to solve the problems posed by Stalin's passing.

\(^6\) Stalin's five "permanently operating factors" were: (1) the stability of the rear; (2) the morale of the army; (3) the quantity and quality of the divisions; (4) the equipment of the armed forces; and (5) the organizational ability of the military commanders.

Turning briefly now to the evolution of Soviet military doctrine during Stalin's postwar years, two basic considerations were paramount on the Soviet military policy agenda: (1) the deepening U.S. involvement in Europe and the American lead in nuclear technology, by which the United States could exploit potential unrest in Eastern Europe or could react unpredictably in a dangerous fashion to Soviet political moves; and (2) the long-range task of steering the Soviet Union through an indefinite period of vulnerability while efforts were made to pare down the West's enormous military advantage. [1] Therefore, Soviet military policy under Stalin was partly the product of necessity and partly the result of Soviet preoccupation with Europe as the decisive arena in which the inevitable contest between East and West would be played out.

The most pressing problem on Stalin's military agenda was that of imposing some adequate restraint on United States power, particularly when the U.S. nuclear lead was accompanied by a great advantage in strategic delivery forces. In the Soviet view, the United States was inherently hostile, and any restraint on its part would not result from American good will, but from pressure that Soviet forces could exert against the United States. 7

However, the kind of continental military power at Stalin's disposal was ill-suited to bring direct pressure to bear against the United States; waging a war to some "successful" conclusion against a nuclear-armed transoceanic adversary was beyond Soviet capability. Therefore, if the United States was to be deterred from pressing its nuclear advantage, then Soviet forces at hand would have to suffice, and the place where this could be best effected was obviously Western 7Regardless of the Soviet view, U.S. restraint was every bit as much self-imposed as it was the product of Soviet doing. The idea of postponing a showdown with the Soviet Union, even during the period of U.S. atomic monopoly, when it was no secret that the Soviets were on their way to acquiring their own atomic bomb, was the underlying premise of "informed" American policy. This idea was based far more deeply on the hope that "time" might heal the differences between the U.S. and the USSR, than upon any notion that additional time would facilitate preparations for delivering a final "crushing" nuclear ultimatum to the Soviet Union. [2]

Europe. By keeping substantial elements of its combined-arms forces deployed in the European theater, poised to rapidly advance westward, the Soviet Union could hope to make Western Europe a hostage for American good behavior. At the same time, these forces could prevent defections from within the socialist camp as well as guard against a resurgent Germany. These considerations, in conjunction with a continental military tradition, helped to explain why the USSR continued to place great emphasis on preserving strong conventional theater forces even after the militant Zhdanovist phase of Soviet European policy. Lacking as yet the means to adopt a strategy of nuclear deterrence, such as the United States had, Stalin really had no other alternative but to rely on Russia's traditional theater forces as the primary instrument of Soviet policy.

In contrast with the American military posture of the late 1940's and early 1950's, which enabled the United States to begin the practice of nuclear deterrence, the Soviet military posture lent itself to deterrence only if the threat of Soviet invasion of Western Europe seemed credible. Thus, Stalin could hardly have deflated military programs and preparations to the degree the West had done immediately after the war, and though these programs doubtlessly enhanced Soviet capabilities in the European theater, they undoubtedly stirred great apprehension in the West. Whether Stalin intended simply to discourage the West from interfering in the affairs of the Soviet bloc he was then in the process of consolidating, or whether he felt that an aggressive policy backed by the authority of Soviet arms might bring substantial political gains in Western Europe is rather uncertain. However, what actually happened largely ran counter to Stalin's interests. Western uncertainty about Soviet intentions -- stemming in part from Soviet readiness to use massive conventional forces against Western Europe, led to the gradual build-up of U.S. strategic power, to the affirmation of greater political solidarity among the countries of Western Europe, and gave the real impetus to the planning for a common defense of Europe, which brought NATO into being.

Another important effect of Stalin's persistent endeavor to improve Soviet capabilities for traditional theater warfare in Europe was to prolong the dominance of a continental military tradition in Soviet military development and strategy. The priority placed in Stalin's lifetime upon the role of the combined-arms forces in the European theater was to persist well into Khrushchev's reign. Thereafter, post-Stalin Soviet military thinkers were left to grapple with the problem of setting new priorities associated with a strategy for nuclear warfare. The weight of old traditional thinking was certainly to influence early Soviet perceptions of the role of Warsaw Pact forces.

Stalin's emphasis on traditional Russian combined-arms strategy does not, however, suggest that he was indifferent to the military technical revolution which ushered in the nuclear age, or that he was resigned to accept a purely continental military posture. Stalin had come early to recognize the need for breaking the U.S. atomic monopoly, and even before the success of the American nuclear weapons program was assured, he had sanctioned the start of a similar Soviet program. [3] Stalin was clearly determined that the Soviet Union should not be left behind in the technological revolution which the nuclear achievement heralded. As the record testifies, Stalin bent great efforts to make the Soviet Union a nuclear power. In August, 1949, the Soviet Union exploded its first (detected)\(^8\) nuclear device, and then slightly less than four years later, its first thermonuclear device. Additionally, both the technological record and our other occasional more indirect evidence into Stalin's decisions testify to the fact that he also gave serious thought to the need for future long-range delivery systems. [4] There is thus no doubt that the credit for initiating programs of research and development that ultimately made the Soviet Union a nuclear superpower belongs to the man most criticized for impeding "creative development" of Soviet military thought.

Without discounting the negative influence that Stalin's attitudes may have had on Soviet military thinking and

---

\(^8\)The first known Soviet atomic test on August 24, 1949 could have been preceded by earlier testing before the U.S. test detection system went into operation. Molotov, in November 1947, claimed that the Soviet Union already possessed the secret of the atomic weapon. preparations at the dawn of the nuclear age, it would seem only fair to judge his outlook in light of the circumstances in which the Soviet Union found itself at the time. The USSR had just begun to acquire a small nuclear capability, distinctly inferior to its American counterpart. From the Russian viewpoint, the immediate aim of Soviet policy was therefore to avoid being attacked or intimidated by its stronger opponent. In these circumstances, it made sense to publicly deprecate the military and political significance of nuclear weapons and to stress the role of the Soviet Union's large conventional forces, while simultaneously resolving secretly to close the nuclear gap. Therefore it was left to Stalin's successors to indulge in the practice of "nuclear blackmail" or to raise the spectre of "mass destruction" when the Soviet Union had attained a somewhat more substantial nuclear capability.

Only in the later years of the Stalinist period was the revival of East European armed forces an important corollary to the strengthening of the Soviet military posture against Western Europe. This process began in 1948, following the disastrous effects of the "Zhdanovschina" during which the fortunes of the badly disorganized national armies of the Interestingly enough, the continental orientation of the Soviet military remained in evidence when nuclear weapons were initially introduced into the operational forces. The bulk of the initial Soviet effort to fashion a nuclear delivery capability went into systems which were essentially oriented toward Eurasian theaters.

East European states were at their lowest ebb. The national armed forces in Eastern Europe were largely "empty shells", small, poorly supported with obsolete equipment, and in most countries neutralized by occupying Soviet forces. In the initial postwar years, it had been in the interest of both the national Communist Parties and the USSR that the East European armed forces should remain in an emasculated condition. In Czechoslovakia, where a relatively strong army emerged from World War II, the Communist Party encouraged its dismantling as an institution which could potentially threaten a future Communist seizure of power. [5]

After placing the East European military command structures in "neutral", the East European Communists concentrated their efforts on placing Party activists in key positions within the armed forces, and more importantly, sought to gain control of, and then to build up the internal security apparatus of each state. These "militarized" security forces, distinct from the "regular" armed forces, played a pivotal role in repressing "anti-democratic" political forces which opposed Communist Party rule. The Polish Communist party used these militarized security forces through the late 1940's to suppress internal opposition instead of using the regular army. However, it was during the National Front Coalition period of the People's Democracies (1945-1948) that the Communists began to consolidate control of the political departments of the East European armed forces. By 1948, local Communists began to replace non-Communist ministers of defense. Emil Bodnaras became Minister of Defense in Romania.
Marshal Konstantin Rokossovsky was made Minister of Defense in Poland in late 1949, and Alexij Cepicka became Defense Minister of Czechoslovakia in April, 1950. With Communists sitting atop the East European military hierarchies, the process of eliminating potentially disloyal, restless or incompetent elements within armed forces was accelerated. There was intensive political indoctrination, and all high ranking officers were required to attend courses at political-military institutes, many located in the Soviet Union. 10

By 1949, with Communist regimes firmly in power throughout Eastern Europe, (the Czech-Communist coup was in February, 1948) Stalin evidently decided the time had come to rehabilitate and expand the East European armed forces. One observer dates the first steps in the rehabilitation of the East European armies to March, 1949, shortly before the signing of the North Atlantic Treaty, when the Soviet Union established a secret bureau to oversee satellite armies, and when they made the prominent Marshal Rokossovsky, a Russian officer, Minister of Defense in Poland. [6] These moves seem to reflect the extent of the Soviet's desire to maintain control of the 10 In some cases the officers of the East European armies were, in fact, Russians. All technical, military and non-military matters were coordinated with Soviet usages such as style of uniforms, marching and drill.

military rehabilitation process in Eastern Europe, with a view to integrating the satellite armies more closely into the Soviet system of control over East Europe. As noted in the second chapter, and illustrated in Appendix B, the Soviet Union completed a series of bilateral defense treaties with East European countries beginning in 1948, which doubtless provided a further basis for the military rehabilitation program undertaken in the years 1949-1953.

Also beginning in 1948, Eastern Europe underwent Stalinization. Domestically, the political and economic systems were forced into the Stalinist Soviet mold; internationally, the East European countries were subordinated under Soviet direction to such an extent that they nearly ceased to conduct independent foreign policies. The national military establishments were similarly affected. As noted, military command positions were filled with Communist and pro-Communist officers, usually of "low" social origin and with little or no prior military experience. The internal organization, training patterns, doctrine, tactics, and, as noted, such trivial matters as uniforms, were modified to conform to the Soviet model. As the heterogeneous structure of the various national forces were modified to conform to Soviet organizational patterns, widespread personnel purges were carried out on grounds of both political reliability and professional efficiency, and as noted, large missions of Soviet officers took over staff as well as command responsibility for retraining the East European armed forces. At the same time, as Soviet forces in Europe were being equipped with modern weapons, satellite military establishments began to receive sizable quantities of Soviet arms, though this material was much less up-to-date than the newest equipments being introduced into the Soviet units. (The main improvements for the groups of Soviet forces stationed in Eastern Europe lay in increasing their battlefield mobility and firepower by motorizing and strengthening their armored elements.) However, the massive introduction of Soviet arms into the East European armies did lay the basis for standardization of equipment and procedures that was carried further during later phases of joint Soviet-East European military arrangements under the Warsaw Pact.

Within the national military structures, the local Communist parties established triple channels of political control; the command channel secured through the replacement of prewar officers by party loyalists was complemented by extending the networks of the Central Committee-directed political administration, and the security services, each with an endogenous chain of command, to the regimental level and below. [7] However, the network of bilateral defense treaties and the dependency of the East European Communist parties on the Soviets notwithstanding, the consolidation of national party control over the respective East European armed forces was for Stalin an inadequate guarantee that they would be totally responsive to Soviet directives. Direct Soviet channels of control were created by subordinating the Soviet-trained East European commanders to Soviet officers of the respective national origin who had served in the Red Army as Soviet citizens. This was the case in Poland when Soviet Marshal Rokossovsky became Minister-of-Defense and Commander-in-Chief in 1949. Also the positions of Chief of the General Staff, Commander of Ground Forces, the heads of all service branches, and the commanders of all the Polish military districts were likewise former Soviet officers who now resumed their original Polish citizenship. This practice was widespread in the Hungarian Army, and was followed to a lesser extent in other East European armed forces. [8] More importantly, thousands of Soviet "advisors" were then placed within the East European armies, constituting a fourth and primary chain-of-command. By means of this "advisor system" the Soviet high command was able to dispose of the East European armed forces as branches of the Soviet armed forces. In the Stalinist period, then, an informal, but effective unified Soviet command-and-control system over an "integrated" East European force was established, setting a standard to which latter-day Soviet leaders would aspire.

After 1949, conscription was introduced into all the East European armed forces, with the exception of the German Democratic Republic (GDR), where the National People's Army, formally established in 1956, introduced conscription only in 1962, after construction of the Berlin Wall had halted massive emigration from East Germany. The results of this initial rebuilding of the armed forces of the satellite countries during the Stalinist period were numerically impressive. By 1953, these forces had attained through conscription a strength of about 1.5 million men organized in from sixty-five to eighty divisions, although perhaps less than half were well enough trained and equipped to be of some combat significance. [9]

On the whole, the rehabilitation and build-up of the satellite forces in Stalin's last years was a process far from completion at the time of his death. Though, as early as 1950, the Soviet "pattern" had been imposed on the East European armed forces, the reliability and the military efficiency of these forces posed serious questions for the Soviet Union. Military integration of the Eastern Bloc forces with the Soviet forces had made little progress under the bilateral arrangements that prevailed, except in the area of air defense. Certainly, Stalin's integration produced no joint framework for cooperative military activity comparable to that perfected in later years under the Warsaw Pact. However, Stalin did set in motion important changes and programs which during the next decade led to the development of a substantial East European military potential. In sum, even prior to creating the Warsaw Treaty Organization, the Soviets had begun to remold the armed forces of Eastern Europe into a separate, subordinate, but still questionable arm of the USSR armed forces. [10]
B. KHRUSHCHEV: 1956 -1968

The founding of the Warsaw Pact in 1955 as a formal, multilateral security alliance of the states within the Soviet orbit had little to do with the process of rationalizing the Soviet and East European military forces. There is little evidence to suggest that the Warsaw Treaty was needed, or even seriously expected to serve as a means to accommodate this integration. As suggested, the Communists had consolidated their control of the East European armed forces during the National Front Coalition period, purging dissident elements and initiating an intensive political indoctrination. Prior to establishing the joint forces under the Warsaw Treaty, the Soviets had already restructured the satellite armed forces to be responsive to their direction. Little substantive reorganization of East European armed forces remained to be done when the Pact came into being, and whether any genuine reorganization of East European forces resulted from the creation of the joint command under Article 5 of the Warsaw Treaty is a matter of some speculation. [11] Very little information on the early reorganization and structure of Warsaw Pact forces is available. In the West, it is generally accepted that apart from a further standardization and upgrading of weaponry, the WTO simply continued earlier arrangements for Soviet consolidation of East European forces. Outsiders tended to consider the Warsaw Pact as being of negligible military value, and viewed the treaty as a Soviet means to justify the maintenance of their troops on East European territory. In reality, the Pact may have hastened the integration of East European forces begun under Stalin, serving largely as an important extension of the early-warning and air defense systems and as an ideological buffer between East and West. The Soviets themselves emphasized only the "defensive" nature of the Pact and phrased their references concerning its military expectations in the most vague and general terms. The possibility that Moscow weighed the value of the Warsaw Pact at least partially in terms of tightening Soviet military control within Eastern Europe should not be discounted. The absence of any evidence that either political or military organization of the Warsaw Pact was independent of any existing Soviet institutions suggests that the Soviet government wanted to establish a more viable hold on the area. [12]

All Warsaw Treaty members except East Germany contributed to the Pact's early military organization. The East German forces were not incorporated into the Pact's military structure until January, 1956, after the first PCC meeting took place. The PCC accepted East Germany's participation in the Joint Command and gave the GDR equal military status with the other East European members. There is really little doubt of a Soviet initiative in the move to change East Germany's status. Although no distinctions were made with respect to GDR membership in the Warsaw Treaty text, East German participation in the Joint Command had been carefully postponed by the Soviets.
This omission seems to support the assumption that, at least initially, the Warsaw Treaty had a largely propagandistic significance related to Soviet East-West maneuvering. [13] Moreover, the GDR contingents were accepted into the unified command only after a bilateral treaty was signed with the Soviet Union, which purported to give East Germany the same kind of status the Western Allies had granted Bonn in May, 1952.

The Warsaw Treaty did provide for a joint military command, which was formally established in Moscow in early 1956. The first Commander-in-Chief of the Pact's forces was a Soviet officer, Marshal I. S. Konev, and each of the Ministers of Defense of the member countries ranked as Deputy Commanders-in-Chief. The first Chief of Staff, General A. J. Antonov, was one of the first deputy chiefs of the Soviet General Staff, and his staff, which was also located in Moscow, appeared to be an integral part of the Soviet Ministry of Defense. The staff of the joint armed forces also included permanent members from the East European general staffs. The disposition of the joint armed forces on the territories of member states was to be covered by separate agreements among the states as their "mutual defense requirements might indicate." Few further details of the Pact's early military organization are available. Yet, in 1956, East European and Soviet press reports began to refer to the presence of senior Soviet military officers in the capitals of non-Soviet members of the Pact, later identified as official military representatives of the Warsaw Pact High Command. No comparable East European missions were set up in Moscow, and East European officers who were attached to the joint staff had little say in Pact military planning. In military terms, the WTO remained a paper organization until the 1960's. Initially, its single concrete military purpose was to provide an alternative legitimization for deployment of Soviet forces in Hungary and Rumania after the conclusion of the Austrian State Treaty. [14]

Even this rationale was short lived, as unrest in Eastern Europe in 1956 led to Soviet military pressure in Poland and the Soviet suppression of the Hungarian counter-revolution. One consequence of the harsh Soviet treatment of East European dissent was a heightened sensitivity to the "forms" of national sovereignty among East European leaders in military matters as well as in other national political realms. The "rehabilitation" of East European armed forces begun in Stalin's last years was now declared complete. In Poland, Marshal Rokossovsky and his fellow Soviet officers were recalled to the Soviet Union. National military uniforms were rehabilitated. Most importantly, the Soviet government's declaration of October 1956, on more equitable relations between the USSR and the East European countries (issued just prior to Hungary's renunciation of the WTO), professed a Soviet willingness to review the whole issue of Soviet troops stationed in Eastern Europe. Not withstanding the brutal Soviet suppression of the Hungarian revolt, in December, 1956, the Soviets concluded a status-of-forces agreement with Poland specifying the terms of the stationing of Soviet forces on Polish territory and pledging their "non-interference" in Polish affairs. Similar status-of-forces agreements were concluded with Hungary, Rumania and East Germany by early 1957 as part of Khrushchev's "tactics of recovering" from the East European crisis of 1956. [15] These treaties regulated the judicial rights and limitations of Soviet troops stationed abroad, and, in most cases, favored the host countries. However, the preamble to the treaties stressed the requirements of the Warsaw Pact as the basis for the deployment of Soviet forces. As a final gesture to East European national sentiments, perhaps as a specific result of warming Rumanian-Chinese relations, Moscow acceded to a Rumanian request and withdrew all Soviet troops from Rumanian territory by early 1958.

In the years immediately following the Hungarian uprising and the Polish crisis, there is little evidence to suggest that the military contributions of the East European armed forces carried any more weight in Soviet planning than had been the case in Stalin's day. Apart from the continued

---

Following the Hungarian uprising, the Hungarian army was virtually disbanded, and its rebuilding began only very slowly; it was not until the mid-1960's that Hungarian divisions were once again able to join the ranks of the Warsaw Pact. Even today, the Hungarian army numbers little more than half the eleven-divisions strong force which failed to support the Soviet cause in October, 1956. At the time, the Soviets increased their permanent garrison in Hungary from two to five divisions; four divisions are still maintained there today.
improvement of joint air defense arrangements in Eastern Europe, the Soviets made no real effort to weld the Warsaw Pact into an integrated military alliance. Little attention was given to the problems of conducting modern theater warfare on a coalition basis, few joint exercises were held, and the Joint Command of the Warsaw Pact remained mostly a paper organization with little real work on their hands.

There was, however, some progress made in the early years of the Warsaw Pact towards integrating and strengthening the East European armed forces, representing essentially the continuation of the trends begun in the latter part of the Stalinist period. A further standardization of weapons was accompanied by limited local arms production under Soviet license. Cuts of 2.5 million men were reported to have been made in the strength of forces between 1955 and 1959, and as noted, after 1956, many Soviet officers serving in the East European armed forces returned to the Soviet Union or left the army. East European armed forces continued to adopt Soviet organizational forms and field doctrine, and a broader

12 According to Marshal I. I. Iakubovskii's volume on the WTO, two joint exercises had taken place before 1961. In August, 1957, Soviet and East German troops conducted a joint exercise, and in July/August, 1958, Soviet air forces and Bulgarian forces conducted a joint exercise on Bulgarian territory. [16]

13 Between 1955 and 1959 Soviet forces were reduced by 2,140,000 men and East European Pact forces were cut back by 464,000 men, reflecting Khrushchev's reordering of Soviet military priorities.
definition of military tasks fell to several of the national armies. However, while the armed forces of the various Pact countries served the obvious purpose of providing support for the Communist regimes in Eastern Europe, and meeting certain traditional needs for national prestige, they could hardly be counted upon to bear much of the burden of any military undertakings in which the Warsaw Pact might become involved. This responsibility clearly rested upon the Soviet Union's own military forces. [17]

As the evidence suggests, in the period between the Hungarian revolution and 1960, the East European armed forces did gain something from the streamlining and re-equiping of their armies, from the integration of their air defenses with that of the Soviet Union, and from a renewed sense of national military and professional pride stemming from a more responsive Soviet posture in Eastern Europe. By February, 1960, when the Political Consultative Committee met for the fourth time, the military forces of at least some of the Pact countries had completed their post-Stalin reorganizations and were ready to enter the next phase of Soviet bloc military collaboration. Yet the absence of any evidence to show that either the political or the military organizations of the Warsaw Pact were independent of existing Soviet institutions suggests that the Soviet Union wanted to establish the Pact as an agency which could transmit Soviet directives, coordinate their implementation, and thus project an "unanimous" East European expression of support for them. Particularly in the military field, it desired an agency that could provide the framework for controlling and administering the East European forces as additional elements set up within the Soviet Ministry of Defense. [18]

The early years of the 1960's were turbulent in Europe, associated with Khrushchev's premature bid to achieve a position of global strength vis-a-vis the United States by a series of "shortcuts" in foreign and military policy. This was the period when Khrushchev introduced his "nuclear missile" strategy, the short but significant "wrinkle" in Soviet strategic thought mentioned in the introductory chapter. Soviet policy toward the Warsaw Pact entered a new phase under Khrushchev around this time, coincident with sharply increased tensions in Europe over Berlin and with the serious deterioration of Sino-Soviet relations on the other side of the world (characterized by the sudden withdrawal of Soviet military aid to Peking in July 1960). This period witnessed the break-up of the Paris Summit, the building of the Berlin Wall, and a resumption of unilateral Soviet atmospheric testing. Above all, it was a period dominated from the Soviet point of view by Khrushchev's failure to understand President Kennedy's willpower and statesmanship, a failure which led to the Cuban adventure and the collapse of Khrushchev's shortcut to alter the strategic balance between the Soviet Union and the United States.
High on Khrushchev's military agenda from the outset was the need to check the further strengthening of NATO, especially since West Germany had been incorporated into the Western defense structure. When West Germany had been taken into NATO in May, 1955, the Soviet response, setting up the Warsaw Alliance, hardly seemed to alter the unpalatable fact that Germany's rearmament had become a reality. The portent of a stronger NATO as a result of a German defense contribution was further compounded by a series of moves designed to put NATO forces in Europe on an atomic footing. These steps, prompted by a shortfall in NATO's conventional force goals, unfolded gradually between 1954 and the end of 1957. This move threatened to reduce the value of Soviet conventional superiority, upon which the USSR had relied, and came at an awkward transitional time for Khrushchev. Not only was he consolidating his political power at home, but in the military field too, he was becoming increasingly aware of the need for a major overhaul of the armed forces and a review of nuclear age military doctrine. Therefore, a further buildup of Soviet conventional forces, which by 1955 had reached their postwar peak, could hardly have appeared to Khrushchev as an appropriate response to a NATO nuclear threat.

In order to strengthen and modernize the Soviet strategic delivery and defense forces, Khrushchev needed to free some of the resources tied up in the maintenance of his massive conventional forces. Therefore, he was more interested in reducing the size of the conventional ground forces than in expanding them. Also, NATO's failure to meet the ambitious force goals set at Lisbon in 1952 doubtless reassured Khrushchev that Soviet conventional forces could be trimmed back somewhat without harm. Meanwhile, Soviet missile technology in the late 1950's was more advanced than the West's, and this new element in the strategic picture held great promise of enhancing the Soviet nuclear posture. Though Khrushchev was late to find that he had overestimated the bargaining power of his missile technology, the early deployment of MRBM's in Europe did give Khrushchev some grounds for the missile euphoria which apparently colored his outlook for a time. [19]

Indeed, Khrushchev banked heavily on the Soviet lead in missile technology to offset NATO's emergent tactical nuclear posture, and this was one of two main elements which influenced the military development of the Warsaw Pact: the first, the effects of Khrushchev's "missiles and rockets" policy and the second, the appointment of Marshal A. A. Grechko as the Pact's second Commander-in-Chief. The main element of Khrushchev's new defense policy, with its emphasis on nuclear missile technology, was that only those elements of the Soviet armed forces which were in a position to influence the initial phases of a war, the Strategic Rocket Forces, the Long-Range Air Force, the strategic arm of the Submarine Fleet, and the Air Defense Command of the Homeland (PVO STRANY) should receive priority in manpower and resource allocation. Other force components including the ground forces, the Tactical Air Force, and the surface Navy would only be used in the follow-up phase of a nuclear war, and in the case of the ground forces, would mainly be employed in "mopping-up" operations. [20]

In a landmark speech to the Supreme Soviet in January, 1960, Khrushchev unveiled this "new look" military policy, spelling out his view of the requirements for a Soviet defense policy and structure in the nuclear missile age. He stressed that nuclear weapons and missiles had become the main elements in a modern war, and that many types of traditional armed forces were rapidly becoming obsolete. He noted the probable decisiveness of the initial phase of any future war, implying that a nuclear war would be of short duration. Finally, he expressed confidence that the "imperialist camp" would be deterred by this new Soviet military might, and then capped his presentation by announcing that the Soviet armed forces could be reduced by about one-third with no loss of combat capability. It would seem, from the contents of this speech that Khrushchev had turned to a "technological solution" to the Soviet bloc's defense problems in a way similar to that favored by the Western Alliance under the Eisenhower administration. [21]

Unfortunately, the greater part of the Soviet military establishment opposed Khrushchev's "one-sided" military doctrine. Many Soviet officers could not support his relegation of Russia's traditional strategic arm, the ground forces, to a non-strategic role. However, the resistance to Khrushchev's ideas by the traditionalist marshals, as well as the pressures of Khrushchev's decision to confront President Kennedy over Berlin in 1961, brought about various "modifications" in the military prescription outlined by Khrushchev before the Supreme Soviet. In particular, the measures actually taken under Khrushchev with regard to Soviet theater forces bore the mark of compromise rather than his personal preference. The measures taken represented only a minor thinning out of the theater forces deployed in forward positions in Eastern Europe. The most radical reform which did occur, was the initiation of a whole series of programs, taking up where Stalin had left off, to modernize and "nuclearize" the theater forces. Great stress was placed on developing greater battlefield mobility and firepower, with massive conventional artillery supplanted to a great extent by tactical missiles employing nuclear warheads. (22)

Soviet policy toward the Warsaw Pact entered the second stage under Khrushchev around 1960-61, coincident with the reorganization of Soviet forces discussed above. The Soviets now began to stress closer military cooperation with East European countries and measures were initiated to improve the collective military efficiency of the Pact forces. This new policy, in contrast to Khrushchev's initial Warsaw Pact policy, had the effect of further upgrading the Pact forces in terms of the common defense of the Communist Camp, it served to elevate the importance of the contributions of the non-Soviet Pact countries in over-all planning, it extended the mission of the East European forces from primary emphasis on defense to an active joint role in defensive and offensive theater operations; and lastly, it promoted joint training and re-equipment of the Pact forces commensurate with their enlarged responsibilities. [23]

This decision to strengthen the military functions of the Warsaw Pact first became visible at the March, 1961 meeting of the Political Consultative Committee (PCC), where the member states agreed on regular consultative meetings of national defense ministers, joint multinational military maneuvers, and Soviet assisted modernization of East European forces. The first of the Warsaw Pact large-scale joint maneuvers, "Brotherhood in Arms," was held in October-November, 1961. Symptomatic of earlier Russian priorities, this exercise, as most others, involved the USSR, the GDR, Poland and Czechoslovakia -- the northern tier -- and while the initial exercises of the early 1960's were interpreted as political demonstrations, by the mid-1960's they had become serious combat training activities. Moreover, the Soviets now supplied the East European forces with modern T-54 and T-55 tanks, MiG-21 and SU-7 aircraft, and other weapons they had previously withheld from East European arsenals. By the mid-1960's, some East European forces were being supplied with nuclear-capable delivery vehicles, although the warheads, then as now, remained under sole Soviet control. Standardization of armaments within the Warsaw Pact was further enhanced as East European states abandoned some indigenous arms production capabilities. These joint training, modernization and specialization programs suggest that the USSR had come to take a more serious view of the potential contribution of the East European armed forces.

It was in this atmosphere of critical reappraisal of the importance of the Warsaw Pact forces and of upheaval caused by Khrushchev's daring military and political policies that Marshal A. A. Grechko assumed command of the Warsaw Pact in July, 1960, after having served as Commander of Soviet Ground Forces (1957-60), and Commander of the Group of Soviet Forces in Germany (1953-57). Grechko has been portrayed as an extremely ambitious man, and an experienced and forceful commander of great will power and considerable intellect. After the Second World War, when serving in Kiev, he struck up a friendship with Khrushchev which was to serve him in good stead in the 1960's. Grechko proved himself an able military administrator and field commander; and there can be no doubt that his ability as well as his friendship with Khrushchev led to his promotion as Commander-in-Chief of the Warsaw Pact forces.

There is some evidence that Marshal Grechko was more favorably disposed toward a greater role for the Warsaw Pact forces than was his predecessor Marshal Konev. He had witnessed the buildup of the East German Army between 1956 and 1960 during his service as commander of Soviet forces there and his advocacy of hard and "realistic" training had been a factor behind the early Soviet-East German exercise of August 1957. It is suggested that Marshal Grechko played an important part in persuading Khrushchev to change his initial attitudes towards the Warsaw Pact forces. [25] It was Grechko who expanded the scope of the WTO exercises to the operational and strategic levels, developing a system of bilateral and multilateral exercises which transformed the military organizations and military capabilities of the five East European armies by permanently drawing them into this system of joint exercises.
Marshal Grechko's efforts to improve the readiness and ef-fiency of the Warsaw Pact armies through frequent exercises, and perhaps also to better their political reliability by involving their senior officers in more responsible military tasks, were matched by an increased recognition of their importance in the Socialist press. Soviet and East European sources were soon to identify the system of joint exercises as the central focus of Pact activities. Though these sources seldom provide accurate information about the number and nature of these joint exercises, one Western author presents a list of some 71 major WTO exercises for the period 1961-1979. [26] Both Soviet and East European sources suggest that the number of lower-level tactical and lower-level joint staff exercises without the participation of troops is much larger than the number of large-scale tactical, operational and strategic maneuvers and high-level command staff exercises. Most of our information on the WTO system of joint exercises is limited to the period 1961 to 1974, and most of this comes from the period after Marshal Yakubovskii was appointed Pact Commander in 1967.

Following the first multi-national Pact exercise in September, 1961, Grechko's training program continued with Polish-East German exercises in Poland, Soviet-Rumanian-Bulgarian exercises and Soviet-Czechoslovakia-East German exercises in 1962. Separate high level Soviet-Hungarian exercises were also held. This formed the pattern of Warsaw Pact exercises for the period 1961-1964. However, from 1965 onwards, the pattern changed: major exercises were held only in the "Northern tier", with the participation of Soviet, Polish, East German and Czechoslovakian troops, while Hungary took part in only one major exercise, "Ultava" in 1966. No significant exercises were held in the "Southern tier" after 1963, and this was no doubt connected with the disagreements between the Rumanians and the Soviets. In contrast, exercises

---

14 The Helsinki accords of 1975 require both NATO and the WTO to report only those exercises involving more than 25,000 troops. The result has been the Soviet reduction of the size of most joint exercises to a figure below 25,000, as well as a sharp reduction in the publication of all information on the system of joint exercises. [27] held in the "Northern tier" were on an impressive scale, suggesting that these forces, in Soviet eyes, were the first echelon of defense or offense against NATO. Analysis of the growing exercise and tactical training programs of the Warsaw Pact further suggests that the armed forces deployed in the Northern European plain have been trained to conduct defensive or offensive operations against the West with the initial use of nuclear and chemical weapons, or with resort to such weapons at an early stage of a campaign. In the words of a standard Soviet work on strategy, "One must regard the conduct of military operations with nuclear weapons as being the basic version. Troops must be primarily trained for such an operation." [28]

A most peculiar aspect of Grechko's system of joint exercises is that these exercises, involved a series of rapidly dispersed troop movements and tactical nuclear strikes, together with political rallies, friendship meetings, concerts, and visits to sites of cultural and historic interest. Soviet and East European sources have paid particular attention to the military-political aspects of the joint exercises, and began reporting these political activities as early as 1962.
The primary purpose of the political activities in the joint exercises was legitimizing the military-political axioms of joint defense of the gains of Socialism against external and internal enemies. The themes of the political activities of the exercises were drawn from the "shared" military-political axioms of the WTO and the military histories of each Pact member, jointly written by Soviet and East European historians, which includes a 35-volume "Library of Victory" series which examines the joint Soviet-East European struggle against fascism. The joint political activities seek to cultivate feelings of proletarian internationalism among the multinational personnel of the Warsaw Pact.

78

According to Soviet sources, representatives of the main political administrations of the participating armies form a unified group which organizes meetings among the "fraternal" troops, meetings of the soldiers with the local population, and plans programs of "agitation propaganda" and "cultural enlightenment." This group also supervises a joint press center, a joint multilingual newspaper published for use during the exercises, joint multilingual radio broadcasts, and a joint cinematography group. The highest ranking party, state, and military officials of the host country participate in the political meetings with the soldiers, and in joint meetings of soldiers and civilians in factories, farms and towns. As an example, during the "Brotherhood in Arms" exercise of 1970 in the GDR, there were more than 40 meetings of allied military units, more than 200 political rallies involving soldiers and civilians, and more than 300 cultural programs. [29]

The political activities of the Joint exercises focus on demonstrating the necessity of a multinational military alliance and on justifying multinational maneuvers on the "sovereign soil" of individual Pact countries. As one Soviet editorial put it: "Yes, the soldiers of the fraternal armies speak in different languages, but they think in the same way. In this regard they are like brothers ... and they understand and recognize that the older brother in this family is the Soviet soldier ... ."[30] There are, however, historical reasons for the individual Pact members to have less than fond memories of "big brother." The Soviet Union's goal, and so the goal of these political activities is to arm the soldiers of the WTO against such memories and against other attacks on the political axioms for joint defense of the gains of socialism.

The Warsaw Pact system of joint exercises initiated by Marshal Grechko also provided for the reentry of Soviet and other WTO troops into the territories of the three East European countries where Soviet troops were not permanently stationed in 1961 (Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Bulgaria). The different histories of bilateral Soviet-East European relations after 1961 corresponds closely to the different decisions made by these East European states on their continued participation in the joint exercises. The periodic WTO maneuvers in Czechoslovakia certainly enhanced the Soviet capability for a rapid and massive occupation of Czech soil, while simultaneously preempting the development of any meaningful Czech system of territorial defense. Rumania, like Czechoslovakia, agreed to conduct joint WTO exercises on its territory, but after 1963, never again permitted WTO maneuvers on Rumanian soil. Given that these exercises involved ground forces, air forces, naval forces, and airborne troops in a "defensive battle for the seizure of the sea coast and also for the conduct of actions in mountains and forest areas," the Rumanians correctly concluded that these exercises were not intended primarily as preparation for battles with NATO, and were not in their best interest. [31] After these early joint exercises, Soviet-Rumanian relations cooled rapidly.

Most importantly, under Marshal Grechko, the High Command of the Warsaw Pact forces took shape as an administrative and coordinating agency for the East European armies. In many ways it resembled the traditional European "war office" which administered forces, but did not command them in time of war. [32] Analyses of Soviet military personalities associated with the Warsaw Pact in the early 1960's suggests that the main staff continued to be headed by a First Deputy Chief of the Soviet General Staff, (though it achieved some degree of independence from that Staff), and operated more as a "Chief Directorate" of the Soviet Ministry of Defense (yet it was still tightly controlled by the Soviet Ministry). For all the improvements in the military capabilities of the East European armed forces achieved through the framework of the Warsaw Pact and its system of joint exercises, there is no indication that the Warsaw Pact itself developed command-and-control responsibilities.
The importance of the administrative functions of the Warsaw Pact High Command was underlined in Soviet Marshal Sokolovski's book Military Strategy, published in 1962. In wartime, Marshal Sokolovski wrote, "operational units, including armed forces of different socialist countries, can be created to conduct joint operations in military theaters. The command of these forces can be assigned to the Supreme High Command of the Soviet Armed Forces, with representation of the Supreme High Commands of the Allied Countries." [33] He went on to stress that the Warsaw Pact forces could operate in peacetime under national command, but in the event of a major operation involving several of the Pact's armies, it was clear that command would be exercised by the Soviet "Stravka" (General Headquarters). This was exactly the command arrangement the USSR used at the end of World War II, and it was also the pattern followed in the Soviet-led invasion of Czechoslovakia. Consequently, there has been little evidence of progress toward meaningful command integration through the Warsaw Pact institutions themselves. The only fully integrated armed forces branch in the Soviet bloc was the Air Defense System, and that was created prior to the WTO by incorporating East European air defense systems into the Soviet PVO Strany. Knowledgeable former East European military officers have confirmed this absence of an independent Warsaw Pact Command and operational capability through the 1960's.

Despite its elaborate formal structure, the WTO, unlike others functional military organs. As noted, the WTO lacks an integrated command-and-control authority, but additionally it lacks an independent logistical system. The logistical build-up for the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 was carried out exclusively by Soviet supply services under the direction of the Soviet Deputy Minister of Defense for the Rear Services. All available information on the structure and organization of the military side of the Warsaw Pact since the early 1960's suggests that in carrying out its task of administering and coordinating the combat readiness of the East European armed forces, and supervising their political loyalty and reliability, the Main Staff relies heavily on the Soviet Military Missions established in all the Warsaw Pact capitols, whose members are believed to have wide powers of inspection and authority to supervise all national training programs. Also, links between the Warsaw Pact and the Permanent Commission for the Coordination of Military Industries of the Council for Mutual Economic Aid (CEMA) suggest that the Pact plays a part in the equipment and weapons standardization of the East European armed forces.

The Soviet effort to infuse the Warsaw Pact with military content after 1960 would seem explicable in both political and military terms. After the disruption of East Europe in late 1956, Khrushchev sought to construct a "viable" socialist commonwealth that would still ensure Soviet control over the broad activities of domestic and foreign policies of the region. On the one hand, the Soviet Union dismantled or mitigated the more onerous forms of Soviet control identified with the Stalinist era, permitting some national autonomy, while on the other hand, the USSR attempted to use Comecon and the WTO as institutional mechanisms for ensuring the stability of Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe. Particularly in light of Khrushchev's new military doctrine, reconstructing the WTO could be viewed as a means for reducing the traditional Soviet combined-arms forces in order to initiate his nuclear revolution in Soviet military organization and doctrine. Khrushchev's conception evidently postulated that Soviet ground forces could be reduced if East European armed forces were to assume a more substantial role. As part of Khrushchev's vision, the Soviet Strategic Rocket Forces were organized in 1960, and the goal of strategic equality with the United States was vigorously pursued. However, the combination of heightened East-West tension in Europe over Berlin in 1961, and the traditionalist institutional opposition within the Soviet military establishment halted Khrushchev's premature bid for strategic superiority, contributing to his fall from power in October, 1964.

C. BREZHNEV 1968-

Khrushchev's use of institutional mechanisms to maintain political cohesion within the Soviet orbit while seeking to strengthen the socialist bloc, tended to drive it further apart. For instance, Khrushchev's plans for the development of supranational organs in Comecon led Rumania to assert its economic independence from the USSR, which was followed by an explicit assertion of political independence and, as suggested, Soviet intentions concerning the Warsaw Pact led Rumania to buttress further its political position by asserting its autonomy in military affairs. By capitalizing on the Sino-Soviet dispute, as well as Yugoslavia's earlier break, Rumania was able to force a return to a smaller, more nationally oriented military establishment, while simultaneously increasing its national (dissenting) voice in WTO affairs. In November of 1964, the Rumanians reduced the length of compulsory military service from two years to 16 months. This decision was reported to have provoked a visit by Marshal Grechko to Bucharest, in which the Warsaw Pact Commander-in-Chief tried unsuccessfully to force the Rumanians to abandon their plan.

The years immediately following Khrushchev's dismissal were politically turbulent for the Pact. Rumanian and Czechoslovakian dissent had created such discord that Brezhnev spoke twice on the need to improve the Warsaw Pact's organization and methods of operation. In September, 1965, he said, "The current situation places on the agenda the further perfecting of the Warsaw Pact organization." [34] The new leadership's concern with deficiencies in the organization suggest that existing machinery was proving incapable of meeting Soviet political imperatives, particularly involving Rumanian behavior, which the Soviets were keen to eliminate. However, it was the Czechoslovakian dissent which tipped the scales and forced a return to older,

---

15 In June, 1966, Chinese Premier Chou En-Lai, who was not welcome in Eastern Europe at that time, was received in Rumania.
more reliable methods of controlling Eastern Europe. As early as July, 1966, a Czech journal pointed out that the different economic, social and cultural development of the Warsaw Pact states contained the seeds of disintegration, pointing out that militarily, the organization of the Warsaw Pact High Command did not fully express a representation based on "equal rights."

[35]

As suggested, Rumanian deviance alone did not account totally for the breakdown of progress after 1965 toward the Soviet goal of creating a permanent political-military coordination mechanism in their Eastern European sphere. The lack of progress suggests a certain amount of neutrality or support for the Rumanian position from some or perhaps all of the remaining East European states. Certainly Czechoslovakian support for the Rumanian grievances was voiced well before the "spring" of 1968. However, none of these basic disagreements, which surfaced in the mid-1960's within the Pact, had been resolved when the Czechoslovakian crisis burst upon the East European scene, and though this important event will be discussed in detail in the next chapter, there are some points concerning Soviet military policy towards the Pact which bear attention.

In 1968, as a reformist political movement headed by Alexander Dubcek gained ground in Czechoslovakia, dissatisfaction with Soviet domination of the Czech armed forces and the WTO military institutions was voiced openly. Czechoslovakian military spokesmen openly criticized the submergence of Czech national military doctrine into the common, Soviet dominated, WTO doctrine. They reiterated most of the earlier Rumanian criticism with great "bluntness," which surely was a contributing factor in the Soviet decision to intervene militarily in order to halt the "peaceful counter-revolution" that was, in the Soviet view, threatening to remove Czechoslovakia from the Soviet orbit.

From a military point of view, the most interesting feature of the Czech crisis was that the Warsaw Pact military staff and organizations faded out of the picture as military preparations for the invasion progressed. The Warsaw Pact High Command was not involved in either the logistics or the Command-and-Control (signals) exercises which preceded the invasion, and its Commander-in-Chief did not assume command of the invading forces. The logistics preparations had been completed in the Soviet exercise "Nieman" on July 24th, and General Shtemenko's "signal exercise" in early August established the command-and-control network for the invasion. The conclusion here is that the Czech crisis showed that the Warsaw Pact High Command had a strictly coordinating, administrative function and was not a command-and-control authority.

In the wake of the Czech experience, Soviet planners were less ready to place much political reliability on the East European armed forces, to whom the Soviet military doctrine had given increasing importance since the early 1960's.
Consequently, Soviet military forces were increased so that in 1978, there were five more Soviet divisions in East and Central Europe than there had been in 1967, and the weaponry at the disposal of the present 31 divisions had been considerably upgraded. This increase of Soviet military strength in Eastern Europe is all the more significant when viewed against a simultaneous emphasis on building up general purpose forces on the Chinese border.

However, presumptive doubts about East European loyalty after 1968 not withstanding, the Soviet Union has by no means abandoned East European military credibility. Since the Czech crisis, manpower levels have remained roughly constant, totaling over one million regular military personnel. Increases in defense spending devoted primarily to modernization of the armed forces have occurred, with defense expenditures largely in proportion to national income, (see Figures 3.1, a-c), except in the GDR, whose defense expenditures have been markedly increasing. This modernization appears also to have been emphasized mainly in the Northern tier members. Participation of East European armed forces in Warsaw Pact joint exercises has continued, as has additional arms transfers including T-62 medium tanks, and advanced MiG-21 and MiG-23 aircraft. [36] The import of the East European contribution to the Warsaw Pact is indicated by the fact that in 1974 East European forces constituted 60% of the Warsaw Pact divisions in the central region.
FIGURE 3.1a
WARSAW PACT DEFENSE EXPENDITURES AS A PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>East Germany</th>
<th>Poland</th>
<th>Czechoslovakia</th>
<th>Hungary</th>
<th>Romania</th>
<th>Bulgaria</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>6.3</td>
<td>2.4</td>
<td>2.8</td>
<td>2.1</td>
<td>1.4</td>
<td>2.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1978</td>
<td>5.8</td>
<td>3.0</td>
<td>3.8</td>
<td>2.4</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>5.8</td>
<td>2.8</td>
<td>4.1</td>
<td>2.4</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>2.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1976</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td>3.0</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>2.5</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>2.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>5.5</td>
<td>3.1</td>
<td>3.8</td>
<td>2.4</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>2.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1974</td>
<td>5.4</td>
<td>3.2</td>
<td>3.8</td>
<td>2.3</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>2.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1973</td>
<td>5.1</td>
<td>3.3</td>
<td>4.0</td>
<td>2.5</td>
<td>1.9</td>
<td>2.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1972</td>
<td>5.2</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>3.8</td>
<td>2.7</td>
<td>2.0</td>
<td>2.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1971</td>
<td>5.1</td>
<td>4.1</td>
<td>3.7</td>
<td>2.7</td>
<td>2.1</td>
<td>2.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>5.0</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>3.8</td>
<td>2.9</td>
<td>1.8</td>
<td>2.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1969</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td>4.8</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

FIGURE 3.1b
WARSAW PACT DEFENSE EXPENDITURES AS A PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>East Germany</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td>3.7</td>
<td>3.3</td>
<td>3.0</td>
<td>2.4</td>
<td>2.5</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>1.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poland</td>
<td>4.8</td>
<td>5.4</td>
<td>5.3</td>
<td>5.1</td>
<td>3.4</td>
<td>3.5</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>4.1</td>
<td>3.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Czechoslovakia</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td>5.7</td>
<td>3.4</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>4.7</td>
<td>5.6</td>
<td>5.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hungary</td>
<td>2.9</td>
<td>2.6</td>
<td>2.8</td>
<td>2.7</td>
<td>2.3</td>
<td>2.8</td>
<td>2.5</td>
<td>2.4</td>
<td>1.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Romania</td>
<td>3.0</td>
<td>3.1</td>
<td>3.3</td>
<td>3.2</td>
<td>1.8</td>
<td>2.7</td>
<td>2.9</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>2.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bulgaria</td>
<td>2.9</td>
<td>3.0</td>
<td>3.1</td>
<td>2.9</td>
<td>1.9</td>
<td>2.4</td>
<td>5.0</td>
<td>4.6</td>
<td>4.0</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

FIGURE 3.1c

WARSAW PACT DEFENSE EXPENDITURES AS A PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>East Germany</td>
<td>1.2</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>2.7</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poland</td>
<td>3.5</td>
<td>4.1</td>
<td>3.5</td>
<td>3.4</td>
<td>4.8</td>
<td>5.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Czechoslovakia</td>
<td>5.4</td>
<td>5.8</td>
<td>6.0</td>
<td>6.6</td>
<td>6.8</td>
<td>7.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hungary</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>2.0</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>1.8</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Romania</td>
<td>2.3</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bulgaria</td>
<td>4.0</td>
<td>3.9</td>
<td>5.0</td>
<td>4.8</td>
<td>--</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The invasion of Czechoslovakia did solve the short-term problem of the Dubcek liberal experiment, but it did not resolve pre-crisis disagreements over rights and privileges of the non-Soviet members of the Warsaw Pact, and the role of the Pact as a genuine forum for discussion and debate. One might have expected the Brezhnev leadership to return to its pre-1968 plans for strengthening the WTO as a mechanism of Soviet military control in Eastern Europe. However, it does not appear that the Brezhnev leadership returned directly to this policy.

Six months after the Czech invasion, the Political Consultative Committee met (for two hours), in Budapest on March 26, 1969, apparently to give formal approval to documents on measures to strengthen the Pact. The communique issued following the meeting indicated that the PCC ratified organizational changes in the Pact's military institutions. These changes were not the result of a "crash" Soviet effort to recover after Czechoslovakia, but appear to be a belated response to the early Rumanian and Czech pressures to improve access to and to gain at least a consultative voice in Warsaw Pact military affairs. [37]

The formal structure of the WTO military organization, incorporating the Budapest institutional changes, are outlined in Figure 3.2. Briefly, a Committee of Defense Ministers was formally constituted as the supreme consultative organ of the alliance; second, the Joint Command of the WTO joint armed forces was reconstituted; designated Deputy Ministers of
FIGURE 3.2

THE WARSAW TREATY ORGANIZATION

National Defense now replaced National Defense Ministers as Deputy WTO Commanders; third, a military council was established as a new body, though little information is available about its function, it is suggested that it serves as a consultative organ of the WTO's senior military officers: fourth, under the Joint Command, a permanent joint staff was established with representation proportional to manpower and defense budget shares of the individual states: fifth, a new organ was established at Budapest concerned with weapons development; responsible for coordinating the production of new weapons and military research and development: Lastly, a new statute for the Soviet armed forces was adopted, which has led to speculation that multilateral or even supranational integrated armed forces had been created within the framework of the WTO. This "new" system proposed to give East European states a formal position in WTO command institutions while at the same time reinforcing the principle of national control over national armed forces.

These new "command channels" however, did not really enhance the importance of the WTO military bodies because Soviet military planning still assumed that, in the event of hostilities, East European armed forces in key battle zones will be automatically incorporated directly into Soviet "fronts" commanded by the Soviet General Staff via theater or field headquarters. Again, this was the command arrangement utilized by the Soviets during the Second World War, and is the command arrangement mentioned in the latest, most authoritative Soviet treatises on military strategy and doctrine. (Sokolovskii's On Military Strategy, 3rd edition, 1968.) In spite of the Budapest reforms, the WTO military organization is still analogous to the traditional European War Office, which does not have direct responsibility for the conduct of military operations. This "arrangement" makes a greater East European voice in the WTO military institutions irrelevant to a real military partnership, even a junior one, with the Soviet Union. Any structural accommodations to East European desires will certainly be set aside in the event of military hostilities. There is no real evidence that suggests that the new, post-Czech WTO institutions enhance the Warsaw Pact's wartime importance.

Notwithstanding the Budapest reforms, the fact of Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe is still beyond question. Apart from the disparity in the sizes of the Soviet and East European military establishments, some 31 Soviet divisions, (about half of which are tank divisions), constituting four "groups," are stationed in the four "northern" East European countries.

---

16 The "Southern tier" generally consists of the three southern components of the Warsaw Pact, as opposed to the "iron triangle" of the GDR, Poland and Czechoslovakia, which compose the Northern tier. Whether Hungary can be included in the "Southern tier" or "Northern tier" is a moot point. By Soviet insistence it is not part of the "Northern tier" because it is not part of the "central front" order of battle. I have chosen to regard Hungary as part of the "Northern tier" based upon the very different Soviet attitude toward dissent in Hungary as opposed to that in Rumania, upon the continued stationing of significant Soviet forces in Hungary, and because historically, Hungary was not considered to be a "Balkan" state.
THE BEAR AND THE FOXES UNDERSTANDING SOVIET POLICY IN THE WARSA--ETC(1)

JUN 81  D L GREENE

UNCLASSIFIED
These four groups consist of (GSFG) (Group of Soviet Forces Germany, (20 divisions), Northern Group, (Poland, 2-3 divisions), Central Group, (Czechoslovakia, 5 divisions), and Southern Group, (Hungary, 4 divisions). (It is also important to note that this forward deployed force can be reinforced at short notice from the eight armies with some 30 additional divisions from the western Soviet military districts.) The arrangement of Soviet forces in Eastern Europe underscores the bifurcation of the WTO into the two "tiers." The key military and political region of Eastern Europe has always been and remains the central European plain, most particularly the German States. In contrast, the Balkans are a secondary political and military area. Consequently, Soviet energies have been concentrated on improving the military capabilities and reliability of the "Northern tier" as the "first strategic echelon." Military dominance in the Central Front has always been regarded by Moscow as essential to the pursuit of Soviet interests in postwar Europe, and now that the Soviet Union has attained approximate strategic nuclear parity with the United States, Soviet doctrine has placed increased importance on the role of local theater military forces. In the event of military hostilities in Eastern Europe, Soviet doctrine anticipates a rapid, massive offensive to the West, for which a strong military position East of the Elbe remains a prerequisite.

The fact that Czechoslovakia had been pressing privately for substantial Pact reforms along the lines espoused more publicly by Rumania from the early 1960's, suggests that the levels of discord among the Pact members seriously jeopardized the principle of integrated Pact forces. After 1968, in one form or another, the central military policy issue for the Soviets was whether to continue in the direction of integrated forces and closer multilateral cooperation as they had since 1961, or to scrap this principle in favor of other military arrangements in Eastern Europe. East German leaders in the fall of 1968, even suggested the Soviets form a selective grouping in Eastern Europe that would relegate the Pact's dissenting members to a secondary status. [38] Such a grouping of Moscow's hard-core supporters could have been envisaged as the organizational instrument for restructuring and "perfecting" the Pact. The Soviet leadership gave no indication that it was prepared to take up such a suggestion, or alternatively, to fall back upon a strictly bilateral pattern of military relations in Eastern Europe. The Soviet Union, despite serious East European dissent, appears committed to the multilateral machinery of the Warsaw Pact (and of Comecon) as the basis of exercising its control in East Europe and of restoring and maintaining unity in its alliance system.
IV. POLITICAL ASPECTS OF SOVIET POLICY IN THE WARSAW PACT

A. ERA OF VIABILITY: 1956-1968

The Warsaw Treaty Organization was certainly an important aspect of the post-Stalin leadership design to replace Stalin's old coercive methods with new mechanisms that would enhance or maintain the Soviet position in Eastern Europe. After 1956, Soviet leaders, principally Khrushchev, sought to achieve this reorientation through a combination of policies which sought to base Soviet hegemony in several institutional forms, principally CEMA and the WTO. Specifically, Khrushchev departed from Stalinist conformity in quest of some new, viable Soviet-East European relationship, which would legitimize the Communist system in Eastern Europe. The most notable reform measures of the Khrushchev era were those affecting economic structures, planning and policy. However, these reforms had serious political consequences, as departures from the old system in the economic sphere tended to encourage pluralism in many other branches of public life. After Khrushchev's ouster in 1964, these developments gathered a momentum of their own. Powerful forces of Nationalism and socio-political change were unleashed in a bold challenge to Communist Party absolutism. Early on, Albania took advantage of the Sino-Soviet split to remove itself from the Soviet orbit. In Rumania, national autonomy was developed through skillful manipulation of the Sino-Soviet dispute and other factors. (In Czechoslovakia, domestic reform rushed toward repudiation of all the known variants of the Communist system itself.) The Czech crisis itself marks the end of the Khrushchev era and the beginning of a new period in which Soviet policy in Eastern Europe strongly tilted back in favor of cohesion. After 1968, in the Soviet view, Eastern Europe required the reinstitution of Communist orthodoxy as a means of restoring the Soviet Union's position within the Socialist system. However, this tightening was accomplished through the institutional mechanisms which Soviet planners had devised in the late 1950's to replace Stalin's "personal" methods after his passing. [1]

When Stalin died in March, 1953, the dominance of the Soviet Union in Eastern Europe appeared fixed, with the primacy of Soviet interests established and assured. However, Stalin's death unleashed divisions among his successors, and a crisis in the Kremlin which stirred East European dissent back to life. Stalin may have been dead, but Stalinism was just beginning to die. The Communist world entered a period of great turmoil and confusion as Kremlin factions formed amorphous groupings in the struggle for ultimate power. The Satellites soon became drawn into the vortex of the Kremlin intrigues as pawns, not pawns of the Soviet Union, but pawns of the warring factional groups. Yugoslavia's defection in 1948 had marked the entrance of national Communism in the otherwise monolithic Socialist system, and the beginning of
In a progressive erosion of Soviet primacy in Eastern Europe, (a process which today is manifest in the current Polish labor crisis). The divisive and corrosive squabbles among the Soviet leadership after Stalin's death combined to further undermine Soviet prestige and authority. Uncertainty and hesitation in Moscow during this succession crisis was to encourage arrogance in Peking, further insolence in Belgrade and a general dissent which swept Eastern Europe.

As the East European states asserted the priority of their own national interests in one area after another, the flow of demands and the resolution of conflicts within the Socialist system underwent some systemic changes. The East European satellites were successful in resisting or trimming the demands made upon them by Moscow. CEMA, for example, which originally facilitated the economic plundering of Eastern Europe for the Soviets, was reorganized to control and arrest Soviet exploitation. Shortly thereafter, it was converted into a vehicle for drawing economic resources from the Soviet Union, as East European states asserted their rights to receive economic assistance, restitution and commercial autonomy from Moscow. As these economic demands upon the Soviets spilled over into the political and ideological realms, individual states demanded and received greater autonomy. The extent to which these demands were successfully asserted depended in large measure upon the leverage exerted in each individual case, and also upon the geo-strategic position of the dissenting party in the Warsaw Pact system. No overt attempt, however, was made to organize joint or concerned action against Moscow until 1961, when Albania and China forged an anti-Soviet alliance. Up to that time, only the Soviet Union enjoyed the privilege of mobilizing parties and states within the Socialist system against unwilling, dissident members of the Communist fraternity. [2]

While it was Tito's defection in 1948 that pointed the way, and Stalin's death in 1953 that created the opportunity, it was Khrushchev's denunciation of Stalin in 1956 at the Twentieth Party Congress that gave the real impetus to pluralistic Communism in Eastern Europe. (The Sino-Soviet split, the detente with the United States as a consequence of the nuclear test ban treaty signed in 1963, and Khrushchev's sudden and unceremonious ouster in 1964 successively accelerated this fragmentation of the East European bloc and created further opportunities for the liberalization of Communism within the regimes.) It was the 20th Party Congress which constitutes a major watershed in the evolution of Soviet relations with Communist East Europe. Locally responsive Communists like Gomulka of Poland and Nagy of Hungary were brought to power by the great external pressures set in motion by the revelations of the "crimes" of Stalin and the "evils of the personality cult" in Khrushchev's secret speech. The demolition of Stalinism at home resulted in the disintegration of Stalinist structures in Eastern Europe. The Polish and Hungarian "Octobers" were the immediate and most serious consequences of de-Stalinization. The tide of nationalism sweeping across the East European states could no longer be hidden by the smokescreen of proletarian internationalism. Thus the year 1956 inaugurated the gradual dissolution of proletarian internationalism into its constituent Communist nationalisms, a process which unfolded gradually and pragmatically in response to the major political, social and economic events of the early to mid 1950's.

The de-Stalinization policy following Khrushchev's revelations at the 20th Party Congress removed the last political pillars upon which the satellite leaders leaned for support and offered national political alternatives a chance to form. In Poland, Wladyslaw Gomulka and in Hungary, Imre Nagy, began to be heard as voices of national Communism. But there was a significant difference in their dealings of the situation. Gomulka was a realistic and committed Communist, concerned only with building Socialism his way, while Nagy did not have the same ideological commitment and allowed himself to be pushed into an increasingly untenable anti-Communist, anti-Soviet position. Yet the two revolts clarified to a great extent the Soviet attitude toward the satellite countries, and demonstrated what could be done within the confines of an overall Soviet military predominance. Gomulka skillfully gained for himself a freedom of action in domestic affairs by recognizing Poland's basic dependence on the Soviet Union and restricting his demands to internal affairs. The Hungarian revolution had no comparably coherent policy, and their attempt to withdraw from the Warsaw Pact exhausted Soviet tolerance. A "Poland" could be tolerated, another "Yugoslavia", never. Unquestioned allegiance to the Warsaw Pact was henceforth to be the keynote in determining which was one and which was the other.

The continuing political diversity in Eastern Europe was a consequence of de-Stalinization and one other distinct, but closely related process: desatellitization. Where de-Stalinization referred primarily to the dismantling of Stalinist institutions and practices, and closely followed the de-Stalinization which took place in the Soviet Union, desatellitization referred to the process whereby the individual countries of Eastern Europe gradually reasserted their autonomy and greater independence from Soviet control, (a process that is still continuing). At an early point in the evolution of East European Communism the two processes came into conflict. In particular, some East European Communists could hardly afford the luxury of de-Stalinization (too much had been done in the name of Stalin). Worse, the practical result of this rehabilitation would be to free a large, obviously hostile element into an already festering political situation. Some countries thus asserted their independence in order to retain certain Stalinist institutions and to resist their complete dismantling. In Albania, as an example, the desatellitezation resulted in the intensification of Stalinist norms rather than a greater internal liberalization. De-Stalinization was, in effect, a process of internal liberalization, a process that progressed at varying tempos in Eastern Europe. The extent to which the individual countries were left to grapple with their own liberalization was more a function of geo-strategic concerns (of the Soviets) than of ideological concerns. The two most independent countries of Eastern Europe, which reflect the two opposite tendencies with respect to Stalinism, Albania and Yugoslavia, are also less strategic members of the Southern tier.

The terms "de-Stalinization" and "desatellization," however, do not accurately describe the total political processes which took place in Eastern Europe. Both processes were transitional episodes in the drive for greater internal and external autonomy. De-Stalinization moved into a process of de-Sovietization, which in Hungary at least eventuated de-Communization. Desatellization implied neutralization at best, or at worst, a withdrawal from the Soviet alliance system which could eventually culminate in a reversal of alliances, either development being very unpalatable to the Soviets. All of these fears, which have been candidly and repeatedly expressed by Moscow, factor into Soviet calculations of East European and thus Warsaw Pact policy.

It was the absence of any common or universal criteria of what constituted "Socialism" after Khrushchev's denunciation of Stalin that created a wide area of ambiguity which caused much anxiety in Communist circles. What started out as de-Stalinization was soon legitimized in the doctrine "separate roads to Socialism." It quickly became evident that the "separate roads" doctrine created logical and practical opportunities for subverting and displacing the Socialist norms established by the Soviet Union. Thus was born the Soviet equivalent of the "falling dominoes" theory: de-Stalinization led to "separate roads," which proliferated into "national deviations," which in turn inspired "modern revisionism," which was a prelude to "social democracy" that quickly degenerated into "bourgeois democracy" and the "restoration of capitalism." [3] The question remained as to when in this process of "creeping" counter-revolution the Soviets might intervene. From an ideological view, this "falling dominoes" theory runs contrary to the natural dialectic of political history which is crucial to Soviet thought. (From recent history it might appear that the Soviet "threshold of intolerance" lies at some point between "modern revisionism" and "social democracy." If the pattern of intervention used in Czechoslovakia in 1968 is repeated in Poland in 1981, then this might provide some clear-cut criteria for predicting when the Soviets might forcibly intervene in this anti-dialectic process.)

The Warsaw Pact, which followed its economic counterpart CEMA by some six years, was established partly as an expression of modern (nuclear) strategy but also as the expression of a political perspective in Eastern Europe that would allow Soviet policy to succeed. The death of Stalin had not brought about a change in the existing power structure within the Soviet bloc, but it had, as suggested, brought about a relaxation of certain economic tensions, accounting for regional variations. However, serious political consequences were inevitable as national political alternatives were given a chance to be heard. The extreme personalization of relations within the bloc, once a source of great strength, became a source of great weakness. A new effectiveness was needed in East European policy, and so Khrushchev, once he had secured his position at the head of Soviet government, initiated a policy characterized by a desire to legitimize intra-bloc relations. As noted, bilateral ties had existed since the end of the Second World War, but there did not exist a multilateral system to make the bloc appear as a cohesive whole. Bilateralism had obviously failed to achieve any real unity or a sense of identification of East European interests with Soviet interests, and a new system had to be created to ensure a stronger Soviet position. After both world wars, ideas for some sort of federation or defense organization against a resurgent Germany had been bandied about both in the Soviet Union and among the states of Eastern Europe. [4] The Warsaw Pact was a Soviet compromise between bilateralism and federation, and became the epitome of the new Soviet policy.

Since Stalin's death, the main aim of Soviet policy in Eastern Europe appears to be one of achieving the right combination of cohesion and viability. For nearly four years after his death, there was no consistent Soviet policy in Eastern Europe, primarily because of the leadership divisions and struggles in Moscow. Above simple palliatives, measures were needed to cope with the rising tide of crisis within the Soviet-East European sphere. This reality became apparent almost immediately in the Pilsa and East Berlin riots of 1953.
The Soviet response was to initiate economic and political concessions collectively known as the "new course," but these were essentially reactions to the unstable situation left by Stalin, rather than indications of any fundamental new ideas in Moscow. Little was added to the East European system that amounted to anything like a "new system."

The result of the 1956 revolutions was obvious Soviet disillusionment with multilateralism as a policy, and a shift back toward bilateralism as exemplified by the status-of-forces agreements with the satellite countries initiated by the Soviets in the months immediately following. The agreement with Poland was particularly significant, for the Soviet Union was obliged to grant Gomulka a domestic autonomy which several months earlier would not have seemed possible. Implicit in this was the willingness of the Soviet Union to regard as a sovereign state, capable of constructing Communism in its own way, any country which was considered a loyal member of the Warsaw Pact.

However, Eastern Europe did undergo a period of apparent consolidation, both militarily and politically, until the early 1960's, with the WTO in the background as a point of reference rather than as an immediate instrument of policy. The notion of the Soviet Union as "primus inter-pares" was stressed, and there was a reliance on ideological commitment, but one more progressively responsive to the needs of the other bloc countries. Inter-state relations assumed a more traditional form, while Party ties were extensively cultured and emphasized. As a result, the Political Consultative Committee of the Warsaw Pact met only twice between January 1956 and February 1960, (see Figure 4.1) and was replaced by informal meetings of Party leaders which offered greater opportunities for exerting subtle pressures. [5]

Khrushchev's attempts to create a cohesive, viable system in Eastern Europe and his only partial success are well known. Against a theoretical background of newly enumerated principles of equality governing relations between Socialist states, Khrushchev saw the institutions of the Warsaw Pact and CEMA as the tools to weld a new and firmer cohesion between the Soviet Union and the East European states. Khrushchev, much more than his predecessor and his successors, stressed the viability aspect over the cohesion aspect of Soviet policy. Whether he or others in the Kremlin consciously believed that the greater the viability, the greater the cohesion, or whether he envisaged a unity between the two, dialectical or otherwise, is difficult to say. But whatever the inadequacies of his conceptualization, Khrushchev, directly at home and indirectly in Eastern Europe, pursued policies and generated an atmosphere that broke the rigid frame of Stalinist conformity in quest
FIGURE 4.1

CHRONOLOGY OF WARSAW PACT POLITICAL CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

1955 - 1980

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Location</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1956</td>
<td>January 27-28</td>
<td>Prague</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>May 24</td>
<td>Moscow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1959</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>February 4</td>
<td>Moscow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1961</td>
<td>March 28-29</td>
<td>Moscow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>June 7</td>
<td>Moscow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>July 26</td>
<td>Moscow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1965</td>
<td>January 19-20</td>
<td>Warsaw</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>July 5-9</td>
<td>Bucharest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1967</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968</td>
<td>March 6-7</td>
<td>Sofia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1969</td>
<td>March 17</td>
<td>Budapest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>August 20</td>
<td>Moscow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>December 2</td>
<td>East Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1971</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1972</td>
<td>January 25-26</td>
<td>Prague</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1973</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1974</td>
<td>April 17-18</td>
<td>Warsaw</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
FIGURE 4.1 (contd.)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Location</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1976</td>
<td>November 25-26</td>
<td>Bucharest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1978</td>
<td>November 22-23</td>
<td>Moscow</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>None</td>
<td>--</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1980</td>
<td>May 9</td>
<td>Warsaw</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

of a viability aimed at making the Communist system more attractive and more legitimate.

The autonomy the Eastern European states developed as a result of Khrushchev's policies served to quicken the stimulus for change at the domestic level and the degree of change varied from state to state. Many factors affected this; perhaps the most important were the levels of economic advancement, public pressure and the degree of self-confidence of the ruling elite. Of all of Khrushchev's reform measures which furthered this process in Eastern Europe, the most notable, were those affecting economic structure, planning and policy. Nearly every country was affected by these measures, and in view of the close interaction between Khrushchev's leadership and East European reform, it was hardly coincidental that the "go-ahead signal" for them was given by the publication of the Liberman proposals in the Soviet Union in 1962. Reform blueprints for a series of measures for greater economic efficiency subsequently appeared in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, East Germany and Poland, even the Bulgarian and Rumanian leaders were constrained to make some efforts at piecemeal change.

These economic reform measures -- again as an illustration of growing diversity -- met with different fates in different countries. In East Germany and Hungary they achieved great success; in Czechoslovakia they were one more ingredient which contributed to the heady mixture of reformist political transformation of the Prague Spring in 1968; in Bulgaria they were hardly given the chance to operate before they were withdrawn. But just as important as their degree of success or failure were their effects on the political and social lives of the countries involved. Even the more cautious of these economic reforms, because they departed from the old command economic system, tended to further encourage pluralism in the other branches of public life. This is what bold and perceptive East European reformers realized and sought to accelerate. As the amount of "leeway" grew out of this interaction, so the Party's united and total control over public life tended to diminish. The development of pluralism in some East European states was a reality of increasing importance in the 1960's. [6]

The period of the 1960's marks the Warsaw Pact's entry into a new phase, broadly described as military progress side-by-side a political awakening of its non-Soviet members. While the military development of the Warsaw Pact's forces proceeded at a steady pace, the political processes of the Pact began to show signs of stress and in some cases, genuine fatigue. This period had witnessed a rapid deterioration of Sino-Soviet relations, punctuated by Khrushchev's sudden withdrawal of Soviet military aid to Peking in July, 1960. The Soviet leaders appeared to be on the defensive in discussions on the political role of the Warsaw Pact, pressing for visible signs of renewed Communist unity under Soviet leadership in the face of a determined Chinese ideological threat. At the center of the dispute was Peking's charge that Moscow's behavior was solely determined by the interests of a "revisionist clique," and that Soviet violations of the principles of "proletarian internationalism" had subverted the underlying theoretical basis of the world Communist movement and system. By subverting ideological interests to Soviet state interests in Eastern Europe, the Soviets tended to confirm the Chinese view. However, the Sino-Soviet conflict enabled the states of Eastern Europe to play off the two Communist giants against one another in a bid to achieve further national autonomy. Albania was the first to use the Sino-Soviet split to separate herself from Soviet paternalism. Next, Rumania was able to secure a large measure of autonomy by offering herself as a "neutral" mediator in the conflict. The atmosphere of uncertainty and hesitation created by this Russian-Chinese antipathy came to encourage further dissidence in Eastern Europe.

The Sino-Soviet dispute and the rise of Chinese influence in Eastern Europe dates to the mid-1950's. Rumanian feelers for Chinese support on ideological formulations have been documented as early as 1954. Though Chinese claims that they exercised some influence in the Soviet decisions to tolerate the outcome of the Polish October and to intervene militarily to end the Hungarian counterrevolution during the crisis of 1956, are probably overstated, Peking was by that time actively involved in East European politics as one aspect of Mao's effort to "reconstruct a Communist center." As noted, late in 1956 and early in 1957, Chinese Premier Chou En-Lai visited several East European capitols. He came preaching unity and criticizing the Soviet leadership. (According to the Chinese, Chou En-Lai criticized Khrushchev for failing to consult with other Communist Parties before denouncing Stalin at the 20th Party Congress.) As later events of the Sino-Soviet dispute made more explicit, the Chinese wanted a voice in how the "leadership of the camp" would be exercised -- which in retrospect, amounted to at least a veto power.

Meanwhile, Khrushchev, challenged by the "anti-party" group, retaining his position by virtue of frantic domestic maneuvering, was in a time of troubles. His policies to create cohesion in Eastern Europe had backfired and his (1955-56) attempt at rapprochement with Yugoslavia was failing. Under pressure from Rumania and Peking, the Soviets were being "forced" to withdraw their forces stationed in Rumania under the Warsaw treaty. China's perceptions of its East European possibilities now began to expand along Rumanian lines. The success of Chinese efforts to maneuver Soviet troops out of Rumania provided an indispensable beginning for subsequent foreign policy deviations from "jointly coordinated" initiatives by other Warsaw Pact members.

Not all early Chinese-East European contacts had such visible results, but the volume of the exchange increased markedly. During 1958, an estimated 108 Chinese delegations visited East European capitols and 150 East European delegations went to Peking. These exchanges were made in a context of wide East European media coverage of Chinese internal developments that carried implications for ideological innovations in these Communist countries. The "Hundred Flowers" period of 1957, the "Great Leap Forward," and the reorganization of China into "people's communes" aroused East European interest. This spreading of Peking's influence into an area long held as a national Soviet "preserve" undoubtedly combined with other undesirable implications of the Chinese challenge to further the Soviet lack of enthusiasm for the Chinese Communists in general. [7]

By 1960, the Sino-Soviet dispute, as yet a non-issue to Western analysts, was a fact of political life in interparty relations. Poland, for example, mistakenly construed the brief blooming of the "Hundred Flowers" as a Chinese willingness to "support our efforts aimed in the direction outlined in October." Chinese approval of Poland's desire for diversity was about the last thing likely, given Peking's preference for a collective appearance on ideological matters. The degree to which East European hopes focused on China as an alternative to Soviet hegemony was an important part of the evolution of East European/Warsaw Pact-Soviet relations whether or nor East European hopes were real or false.

The impact of the deepening Sino-Soviet conflict involved East Europe and the Warsaw Treaty Organization in more than one dimension. First, East European forums served as a staging ground from which the principles gingerly played their hands. At the February, 1960 PCC meeting, the Chinese observer's speech provided a militant contrast to the otherwise moderate tone of the official Pact (Soviet) declaration. At the Rumanian Party Congress in June 1960, hostilities broke into open, bitter debate between Khrushchev and the head of the Chinese delegation, P'eng Chen. The Soviet leader not only attacked the Chinese, but reportedly issued a long letter to other Parties, detailing Peking's ideological shortcomings. The Chinese reply, surprisingly moderate compared with later such pronouncements, showed little willingness to recant or to even retreat on the issues dividing the Soviet Union and the People's Republic. As the crisis went on, the East European Party leaders were increasingly aware of the dispute in which they, like it or not, were becoming more and more involved.

Second, both Moscow and Peking had reasons for wanting to keep an awareness of their differences within Communist circles. Therefore, following the first wave of esoterically communicated disagreements, came a period of surrogate struggle during which the Soviets attacked Albania, meaning China, and the Chinese retaliated with polemics against the Yugoslavs, meaning the Soviets. The "shadow-boxing" continued until the 22nd Party Congress, when Khrushchev's angry outburst against Tirana brought open objections from Chou En-Lai on the issue that disputes between fraternal parties should not be handled by public censure, and that showing one's difference in the face of the enemy cannot be regarded as a serious Marxist-Leninist attitude. [8]
By 1961, Albania had split with Moscow and politically had become an island of Chinese influence in the Balkans. The Soviet-Albanian conflict was qualitatively different from the 1956 events in Poland and Hungary. First, although the impact of de-Stalinization had helped to precipitate all three crises, Stalinists retained control of the Albanian Communist party. Second, Soviet-Albanian relations deteriorated gradually, and with the memories of Poland and Hungary still relatively poignant, the Soviets never found a convenient moment to intervene. Third, non-Warsaw Pact members played vital roles in this conflict in that tensions increased in proportion to improvements in Soviet-Yugoslav relations, with the Communist Chinese providing an alternative source of support for the Albanian cause. This was hardly surprising, as from the beginning, Albanian defiance was in large measure a reflection of Sino-Soviet differences. [9]

By the June, 1962 PCC meeting, Albania, although in theory retaining membership in the Warsaw Treaty Organization, had been effectively excluded from participation within the framework of the Pact. Throughout 1962 and 1963 the Soviets continued attacking Albania at a series of European Party Congresses, charging that Albania's primary sin was alignment with China against Soviet positions within the international Communist movement. Albanian membership in the Warsaw Pact was largely ignored and because the Soviets did not resort to the use of force, the effect of the Soviet-Albanian dispute upon the Warsaw Pact institutionally was limited.
Although de facto exclusion of Albanian representatives from the WTO was the result of the dispute, Albania was never formally expelled. The problem of Albania's relations to the Warsaw Pact subsided into "more of the same" polemics on the appropriate anniversaries. Within the Pact itself, speeches ceased being published, meetings became briefer, and differences were either suppressed or handled through noninstitutional channels. Simultaneously, the military aspects of the Treaty predominated both in terms of activity and Soviet perceptions of the Warsaw Pact's importance. In short, the appearance of internal conflict had resulted in first, the suppression of diversity, and then in the exclusion of the bulk of political content from the Warsaw Treaty Organization. Relations between Tirana and Moscow had deteriorated to the point that diplomatic relations had been broken off in 1961, after the 22nd CPSU Congress, when the Albanian embassy in Moscow distributed key Albanian documents relating to the dispute. Thereafter, the Albanians seized the Soviet submarine base at Valena on the Adriatic coast and played no further part in Warsaw Pact affairs. The Soviet-Albanian dispute did not take on real significance again until the multilateral invasion of Czechoslovakia precipitated Tirana's formal withdrawal from the Warsaw Treaty Organization in September 1968. In sum, from 1963 until 1968, the Albanian question within the alliance was placed on ice, overshadowed by Bucharest's challenge to Soviet organizational control of the Warsaw Pact. [10]
Rumanian cleverness in maximizing the opportunities provided by the Sino-Soviet dispute are well known, but the subsequent Soviet-Rumanian maneuvering within the Pact was principally an extension of Bucharest's rejection of supranational planning within the CEMA. Signs of strain in the economic relations of Rumania with the other members of CEMA have been documented as early as 1953, with the Rumanians openly stating their case in bloc literature in 1958. As Soviet control in East Europe suffered the shocks of Poland and Hungary in 1956, the falling away of Albania and potential further ideological undermining from China, Moscow attempted to compensate by strengthening joint institutions as organizational instruments of Soviet influence. In December, 1961 the 16th CEMA Council planners officially recommended the principles of the "International Socialist Division of Labor" and a number of unspecified changes. These principles were then dramatically accepted by a meeting of the First Secretaries of the Communist parties of the member countries in June 1962. Between December 1961 and June 1962, there appeared articles reiterating East European reluctance for a single plan encompassing the entire Socialist system. Concretely, this plan meant an emphasis on integration and socialist division of labor within the CEMA. For Rumania, nothing could have been more threatening, for despite major successes in establishing some industrial infrastructure, Rumania remained predominantly agricultural. Not surprisingly, Khrushchev's interpretation of the direction to be taken by the World Socialist system at that stage (one in which he considered "conditions" had "ripened" for raising economic and political cooperation to a new and higher level) was not shared by the Rumanian Party leadership. Khrushchev was being both politically blunt and unambiguous about an unpalatable end when he stated:

"... with the emergence of Socialism beyond the boundaries of a single country ... the (economic) law of planned proportional development operating on the scale of the system as a whole calls for planning and definite proportions both in each of the Socialist countries taken separately and on the scale of the entire Commonwealth." [11]

It did not take much for Rumanian Party leaders to see the implications of this pronouncement for their country's future economic development. Despite evident East European hesitation, the Soviet leadership pushed ahead, demanding "bolder steps toward the establishment of a single planning body for all countries." [12]

Scant progress was made by the 17th CEMA session in December 1962, and by the Summer of 1963, the Rumanians had visibly moved out of line (and one step closer to the Chinese). As the Sino-Soviet dispute intensified (over Albania) the importance of Rumanian resistance to economic integration influenced the Soviet perspective as Moscow sought support within the bloc for an international Communist conference to expel or at least condemn Peking. Bucharest first stalled, and then maneuvered itself into the position of go-between. It is doubtful that the Soviet leadership was pleased to have Rumania assume the role of mediator in the Sino-Soviet dispute, but they accepted it, at least temporarily. When the attempted mediation collapsed under the combined weight of Soviet and Chinese polemics, the Rumanians documented their own reflections on the process. This remarkable statement amounted to a declaration of neutrality that made clear Bucharest's objections and did not hesitate to draw pointed historical analogies on the dangers of misusing Communist organizations to referee interparty differences.

Rumania's economic strength, natural resources and strong nationalist feelings, harnessed by an authoritative Communist regime, had made her an important Pact critic of the Soviet Union. As an outgrowth of Rumania's challenge to Soviet integration plans under Comecon and her skillful management of the Sino-Soviet dispute, Rumania came to adopt the principle of "non-interference" in the affairs of other countries, and from 1963 onward, began to reserve the right to make her own decisions in foreign and defense policy (the unilateral reduction in the length of compulsory military service is an example). After Khrushchev's ouster, the Soviet leadership under Brezhnev and Kosygin evidently wished to mend fences by treating Soviet-Rumanian tensions as a personality conflict with their "hare-brained" predecessor. However, by that time, Bucharest had a vested interest in "correct" socialist relations with all disputants. Moscow continued to press for condemnation of the Chinese, while Peking continued to encourage Rumanian neutrality in hopes of "tilting" a second Balkan country into the Chinese camp.
Rumania's gradual emancipation from Soviet dominance, which originally had been facilitated by the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Rumanian territory in 1958, was finally symbolized by the Rumanian "declaration of Marxist independence." This declaration, issued in April 1964 by the Rumanian Central Committee, signalled Rumania's formal rejection of CEMA's plans as incompatible with Rumanian national sovereignty. In addition to her opposition to supranational economic planning, Rumania resisted the process of military integration and centralization within the Warsaw Pact, and further insisted on "equality" and "independence" in interparty and interstate relations. Rumania's dissatisfaction with Warsaw Pact military arrangements was expressed in several ways soon after Khrushchev's ouster. In November 1964, Rumania reduced compulsory military service, as noted, and at about the same time Rumanian officials spoke of the "need for new ways" of reaching decisions within the Pact. [13]

Rumania's lack of enthusiasm for the Soviet interpretation of the Pact's role as a transmission belt for Soviet orders and as a coordinating agency for Soviet foreign policy further aggravated the Soviet-Rumanian discord. The Rumanians seemed to have found a loophole in the Warsaw Treaty and its organization, which allowed them to use the Pact as a forum for open discussion of alliance problems and also to take action on their own interpretation of the rights and privileges of Pact members. Some of Rumania's grievances included: (1) the continued domination of the military side by the Soviet Union, (2) the absence of consultation procedures on the use of nuclear weapons, and (3) the financial contributions necessary to keep Soviet troops stationed on members' territory. (At a preparatory meeting for the Assembly of the PCC held in Bucharest in July 1966, the Rumanians publicized their views and canvassed support among the other Pact members. The subsequent communique contained several items consistent with the Rumanian view: (1) a regard for national sovereignty, (2) equal rights for Pact members, (3) noninterference in the affairs of other countries, (4) a readiness to dissolve the Warsaw Pact should NATO do the same. It is this "Rumanian interpretation" that the Russians were keen to eliminate when in 1965 Brezhnev spoke of "perf ecting the Pact."

From the evidence available, it is difficult to determine just how the East European countries lined up on the need for organizational reform of the Pact. Two kinds of organizational change seem to have been at issue: (1) changes in the Political mechanism for coordination and enforcement of a foreign policy line; and (2) reform of the military arrangements within the Pact. For their part, the Soviets were interested primarily in organizational reform in the first category, while Rumania and her sympathizers seemed to have approached the issue of reform from the other end. The Rumanians were interested essentially in preserving the Pact's existing political machinery (which gave the individual countries considerable latitude on foreign policy matters) but with regard to the military command structure they were pressing for sweeping reforms intended to lessen the Soviet Union's military control. Through the Fall of 1965, the Soviet Union evidently continued to work behind the scenes to promote its version of organizational reform within the Warsaw Pact, but in March 1966, Brezhnev once more called for "improving the mechanism of the Warsaw Pact." In May 1966, Rumanian sources "revealed" (leaked) that a meeting of the Pact's Political Consultative Committee would be held in July in Bucharest, where it could be expected that the contending Soviet and Rumanian views on the organization and functions of the Pact would be thrashed out.

The Bucharest conference contributed little to Soviet hopes of ironing out the many internal differences over the political and military relationships within the Warsaw bloc. The conferees endorsed neither Soviet advocacy of institutional improvements to provide a "permanent and prompt mechanism" for coordination of Pact policy nor the Rumanian suggestions for the further loosening of Soviet control over the alliance machinery. Similarly, the CEMA session tacked on at the end of the conference failed to come to grips with the divisive economic issues that plagued Soviet-Warsaw Pact relations. The point of primary interest which issued from the Bucharest Conference was a Soviet proposal for "an all-European conference" to discuss security and promote European cooperation. The central significance of this proposal, which would have had wide-ranging implications for future Soviet policy in Europe, hinged on (1) a dissolution of existing alliances in favor of a new, all-European security arrangement, and (2) a guarantee that the new European order would recognize the permanent division of Germany.\(^{17}\)

In the two years after the Bucharest Conference, the Soviet Union was obliged to cope with progressively troublesome threats to its control over Eastern Europe and the units of the Warsaw bloc. These challenges began with Rumania's breaking of ranks on a common line toward West Germany, which made more difficult the problem of maintaining bloc cohesiveness in the face of Bonn's ost-politik. However, it was the subsequent and perhaps largely unforeseen events in Czechoslovakia which posed the most serious problem for the Soviet leadership. Regarded at the time as the gravest challenge to Soviet interests in East Europe, Czechoslovakia's new course under the Dubcek regime not only raised doubts as to the steadfastness of the military and foreign policy of a key member in the Pact's Northern tier, but in the Soviet view, it also threatened to weaken the internal structure of Communist rule -- perhaps a more disturbing prospect.

\(^{17}\)\ The backstop for the dissolution of the Warsaw Pact under an all-European security system lay in the bilateral treaty network carefully maintained by the Soviets in addition to the WTO. Under the bilateral treaty system, the Soviet Union would be guaranteed continued military access to Eastern Europe should the West decide to accept Soviet calls for dismantling NATO and the Warsaw Pact.
B. ERA OF COHESION: 1968-

The steps Khrushchev took in Eastern Europe after 1956 had ushered in the era associated with the emphasis on viable relations between the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. The Soviet-led invasion of Czechoslovakia marked the end of that era and the beginning of a new period in which the relationship between cohesion and viability was strongly tilted back in favor of cohesion. The trauma of Czechoslovakia itself, and the disruptive potential of the Prague Spring, had the Soviet Union and even some parts of Eastern Europe convinced that the spirit of innovation, experimentation and reformation that had been abroad in Eastern Europe during the Khrushchev era had to cease. The situation, in their view, demanded a counter-reformation, and the reinstatement of orthodoxy as a means of restoring control over Eastern Europe and protecting the Soviet Union itself against the dangers inherent in the Czech developments. [15]

It is difficult to find a label that properly describes the evolving alliance system in East Europe to which Khrushchev's successors fell heir. At the time Brezhnev and Kosygin came to power, the Soviet bloc was held together by a complex web of ideological, economic, political and military ties. The East European states clearly were no longer completely subordinated to Soviet power, yet Soviet influence still set limits upon independent national actions. Each of the East European states was obliged to work out an "adjustment" between its own national aspirations and the requirements of bloc solidarity. From the Soviet view, ever since Khrushchev gave a green light for greater autonomy in Eastern Europe, Moscow had found itself alternating between bilateral dealings with the individual alliance regimes and attempts to exercise its leadership through some multilateral form of institutionalized unity. Even though economic integration through CEMA had fallen flat in 1962-63, the Warsaw Pact had continued to be "upgraded" slowly as a multilateral instrument through which at least military integration could be promoted. The Pact had proved to be a limited means through which intrabloc conflict and function could be addressed, but it remained, like CEMA, something less than an ideal instrument for carrying out common policy issued from Moscow. Both the WTO and CEMA as multilateral systems lacked effective organs for policy-making and centralized enforcement of decisions. Authoritative policy formulation had rested mainly with the Party leaderships who met, as circumstances demanded, through a system of "mutual concessions, conference and discussion." [16] Even then, policy decisions were not binding and were implemented largely by the national parties rather than through the supranational machinery of the bloc.

Since neither bilateral nor multilateral principles for managing Soviet relations with the other Warsaw Pact members had proved altogether satisfactory, a third alternative was pursued by the Brezhnev-Kosygin regime. The Soviet leadership attempted to cultivate further the trend toward regional differentiation which had developed between the Northern tier states and the Southern, or Balkan, grouping. The Northern tier countries, which together with the Soviet Union itself, formed what is sometimes referred to as the "first strategic echelon" of the Warsaw Pact, were obviously of prime strategic and political importance to Soviet European policy. Not only did their territories lie astride what in wartime would be the main axis of a central European campaign, but these countries also shared the most immediate geopolitical interests against West Germany. Thus the Soviet Union found it advantageous to confer a privileged status upon the Northern tier countries which received a more important regional role in Soviet military and economic planning. However, the Soviet Union did not institutionalize the separate status of the Northern tier, which would have formalized yet another division in the Warsaw Pact. This, then, was the trend in Soviet policy toward the Pact when Brezhnev and Kosygin took office. Basically, the decline of Soviet dominance in East Europe during the past decade had left Khrushchev's successors with the broad choice of either making the best of an unsatisfactory situation of 18 According to one source, the idea of a northern regional grouping with a preferential relationship with Moscow originated with Gomulka between 1959 and 1963, and was inspired by his concern that a bilateral Soviet-East German axis might be formed at Poland's expense. I would suggest that the emphasis on the Northern tier evolved more out of Soviet geostrategic considerations than out of any Polish geopolitical psychosis.

trying to reimpose Soviet will throughout the region. In the first years of the new regime, they apparently accepted the former alternative, following largely a conciliatory and fence-mending line in East Europe. However, the Brezhnev-Kosygin regime was forced to reverse itself when it called upon Pact troops to restore Soviet authority in Czechoslovakia. [17]

None of the basic disagreements had been resolved when the Czechoslovak crisis burst on the East European scene in the Spring of 1968 with the publication of the Czechoslovak Communist Party's "Action Program" on April 9th. The Czechs pointed out that the non-Soviet Warsaw Pact allies did not enjoy a full representation based on equal rights, and urged that the political structure of the Pact become a responsive, systemic body. Evidence of Czech doubts were apparent as early as 1966 when a Czech political journal pointed out that the differing economic, social and cultural developments in the Warsaw States contained the seeds of disintegration. There were basic differences and disagreements on the interpretation of the fundamental problems of revolutionary strategy and tactics, and there was no unity of view on the political part of Socialist military doctrine. They concluded that the cooperation of the Socialist states was inevitably endangered and that the military alliance could be seriously affected. The main danger of the "Dubcek era" was the loss of orthodox Communist Party control over the country and the threat that "counter-revolutionaries" would drive a wedge into the heart of the Warsaw Pact area.
Soviet attempts to reassert orthodox Communist control over events in Czechoslovakia took the form of a series of bilateral and multilateral meetings, backed up by sustained propaganda offensives and provocative troop movements, all designed to intimidate the Czech leadership and to persuade them to abandon their reform program. From the beginning there existed a strong presumption that the Russians might be tempted to deal with the Czech problem by military means.

To quote a Soviet spokesman:

"In the event of appeals for help from 'faithful Communists' in Czechoslovakia, the Soviet army would be ready to do its duty." [18]

The first political confrontation between the Czech leadership and the Soviet Union, and those of her allies uneasy about Czech developments (Poland, East Germany, Hungary and Bulgaria) took place at Dresden on March 23, 1968. (Rumania was not invited.) The Czech delegation admitted that the allies' concern over events in Czechoslovakia was understandable, but the communique issued after the meeting was devoted to the organization of the Warsaw Pact and related economic affairs. In April, 1968 the Czechs published their "Action Program" and Dubcek visited Moscow to explain it to the Russians, who declared they had no intention of intervening in Czech affairs. However, after Dubcek's departure, Polish, East German, Hungarian and Bulgarian representatives met in the Soviet capitol to study the "Program's" implications. The next major confrontation occurred when Soviet Premier Kosygin visited Czechoslovakia at the same time that senior Soviet officers were in Prague to discuss a strengthening of cooperation within the framework of the Warsaw Treaty. After a period of polemics between the Soviet Union, her sympathizers, and Czechoslovakia, Czechoslovakia's critics gathered in Warsaw on July 15, 1968 and sent a strongly worded letter to the Czech leadership demanding resumption of full Party control. At the end of July, amid mounting military and political tension, the Czech and Soviet Politburos met at the border town of Ciernanad-Tisou and discussed the issues between them in secrecy for three days. After the Cierna meeting, the Czechs announced their intention to meet with the signators of the "Warsaw Letter" at Bratislava on August 3rd, and to sign a joint declaration reaffirming Czechoslovakia's loyalty to the Warsaw Pact. Czech statements after the Bratislava meeting exuded confidence and it looked as though the Russians had agreed to a compromise authorizing the continuation of the Czech liberalization program. In Dubcek's own words, the Cierna and Bratislava meetings had "opened up new possibilities for the revival process in Czechoslovakia." The Czech leadership proceeded with their reform measures which included the publication of liberal Party statutes to be discussed at the Czech Party Congress on Sept. 9th. Dubcek received Rumania's President Ceausescu, Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia, and East Germany First Secretary Walter Ulbricht in the second week of August, with the appearance of a statesman who had just pulled off a successful coup. Three days after the last visits, Soviet, Polish and Hungarian armies with representative contingents from Bulgaria and probably East Germany crossed the Czechoslovakian frontier. The nightmare of "dominoes" falling all over Europe had been too much for the Soviet Union.

Two points immediately stand out about this series of political confrontations between the Soviet Union, her four allies and Czechoslovakia: (1) No meeting of the Political Consultative Committee of the Warsaw Pact was called to deal with the crisis; and (2) the really important sessions were bilateral meetings between the Russians and the Czechs, (Moscow in May, Prague in June and Cierna in July). The multilateral meetings at Dresden and Bratislava were much less significant and more ceremonial. [20] Although the WTO was referred to extensively at the Dresden, Bratislava and Warsaw meetings, none were held as a meetings of the Pact, and none made use of Pact arrangements or machinery. (The PCC could not have been used as an instrument of discussion and negotiation in the Czech crisis once the Soviet Union had decided to exclude Rumania from the collective meetings on the Czech situation.) The inference to be drawn is that the Warsaw Pact was not found to be a suitable organization through which to deal with attempts to restore the orthodox Communist foundations of one of its members. Clearly, the Soviet Union preferred to hold "ad-hoc" meetings restricted to her sympathizers, and engage in serious bilateral talks, bringing in her four allies as appropriate and relying for effect on mounting pressure from threatening military deployments. (The contrast with the NATO council procedures could hardly be more striking.)

The Soviet action against Czechoslovakia was a frightening tribute to Soviet military power and also to the grotesque morality of Communist ideology. It is important to distinguish the Czech case from the Rumanian case. (Internal authority vs. independence in foreign and domestic affairs.) The Rumanians did not challenge the legitimacy of Marxism-Leninism, did not seek to "humanize," "revise," or "liberalize" Communism and hence posed little threat to the legitimacy and stability of the Soviet system. [21] By resorting to military occupation of Czechoslovakia, the Soviets signified their determination to maintain their social and political order in the traditional "great power" sense.

The subjugation of Czechoslovakia signalled a new era in the relationship between Moscow and the East European states, a phase in which the security and the national interests of the Soviet Union were given unambiguously high priority in Soviet calculations. The purpose and usefulness of the Pact in the Soviet view basically had not changed, despite a shifting emphasis on organization and structure. The Soviet Union still needed the Warsaw Pact for the transmission of political and military directives to her East European allies and coordinating East European support for Soviet foreign and intrabloc... policy. The Soviets, though, had hoped that the Warsaw Pact would be a form of insurance against effective innovations by leaders of the East European Communist Party. In this they were certainly mistaken.

Following the Czech invasion, Moscow reassessed Warsaw Pact functions and resolved to give the East Europeans more consultative privileges but the result had been directed consultatives and not a genuine counciliar system. Before the Czech invasion, the countries of East Europe could be grouped into four general categories in reference to their relationship with the Soviet Union: (1) Yugoslavia, an independent, "neutralist," and "non-aligned" Communist state that exercised complete sovereignty in domestic and foreign policy, and was totally outside the Warsaw Treaty Organization; (2) Albania, an independent, anti-Soviet, anti-revisionist Communist state, ideologically allied to the Chinese; (3) the Warsaw Pact countries of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and East Germany, which were client states of the Soviet Union; and (4) Rumania, a dissident and non-cooperative member of the Warsaw Pact, a neutral in the Sino-Soviet conflict, and quasi-independent in its foreign policy. After the Czech invasion, Yugoslavia, Rumania and Albania were further alienated from the Bloc, Czechoslovakia was returned to vassalage, and Poland, East Germany and Hungary were forced to a position of greater dependence on the Soviet Union. [22] The Soviet brand of Communism had been irrevocably associated with Russian and Soviet imperialism, domination and control. This has formed a barrier to acceptance, assimilation, and adaptation to the Soviet system in the traditionally anti-Russian countries, and has had some negative effects in the pro-Russian countries.

By intervening in Czech affairs, the Soviet Union had reached a crossroads in its relationship with Eastern Europe. Before the Czech crisis, the Soviet position in Eastern Europe had been clearly slipping in response to nationalist pressures and a lessening of the external threat. [23] In the post-Czech era, Soviet policy has been designed to promote a greater integration in Eastern Europe, as a means of restoring Soviet control and forestalling a revival of reform Communism.

Confronted with disarray in its East European relations, the Soviet government had no alternative but to ensure that the original requirements, for which the Warsaw Pact had come to fulfill, be maintained by tightening Party orthodoxy. The Soviet interpretation of what was needed in Eastern Europe would have to be accepted by all Party leaderships. For this purpose, the Soviet leaders laid down the "Brezhnev Doctrine" on limited sovereignty for Communist countries. [19] The Brezhnev Doctrine maintained that a Communist country has a right to self-determination only so far as this does not jeopardize the interests of other states of the "Socialist Commonwealth," that each Communist party is responsible to the other fraternal parties, as well as to its own people, and that the sovereignty of each country is not "abstract," but "an expression of the class struggle." [24] In short, the
One month before the Pact armies occupied Czechoslovakia, the heads of state of the Soviet Union, East Germany, Poland, Hungary and Bulgaria issued a letter (the Warsaw Letter) to the leaders of the Czech Communist Party, warning that Czechoslovakia could maintain its independence and sovereignty only as a member of the Socialist community. Shortly after the invasion, the World Communist leaders received their first lecture justifying the Soviet action. In the September 26, 1968 issue of Pravda Soviet Party ideologist Sergei Kovalev explained that each Communist Party is responsible not only to its own people, but to all Socialist countries. Thus, if the gains of Socialism are endangered in one country, the Socialist community as a whole has the right to eliminate the danger.

On October 3rd, Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko announced at the United Nations that the Socialist states could not and would not allow a situation where the vital interests of Socialism are infringed upon, and encroachments are made on the inviolability of the boundaries of the Socialist Commonwealth. This statement quite clearly defined the Soviet attitude toward traditional international relations. It appeared to be a Soviet axiom that the traditional principles did not apply to relations between the fraternal nations of the Socialist bloc. In a speech to the 5th Congress of the Polish United Worker's Party on November 12, 1968, Brezhnev enumerated these principles as they governed the cooperations of bloc members. The fundamentals of the Doctrine, which the Polish Worker's Congress declaration have been associated with Brezhnev's name are:

"There is no doubt that the peoples of the Socialist countries and the Communist Parties have, and must have the freedom to determine their country's path of development. However, any decision of theirs must damage neither Socialism in their own country, nor the fundamental interest of any other Socialist countries ... This means that every Communist Party is responsible not only to its own people but also to all the Socialist countries and to the entire Communist movement."

Since the initial enunciation of the Doctrine, its interpretation occupied a central role in political studies inside the bloc. Soviet theorists have taken great pains to prove that the axiom is a Leninist legacy, also that international law which regulates relations among Socialist states goes beyond general international law. It should be noted that the Soviet Union has never formally admitted the existence of the Brezhnev Doctrine; however, it has also never been repudiated. [25]
Soviet Union reserved the right to define each country's sovereignty.

In following up the Brezhnev Doctrine, the Soviet government first secured the legal right to garrison troops in Czechoslovakia, (5 Soviet divisions are currently positioned on Czech soil, comprising the Central Group of Forces), under a treaty signed October 4th, 1968. The most significant factor of the group's deployment is that it was not positioned to strengthen the defense of Czechoslovakia against NATO or West Germany. No Soviet formations were stationed on the West German frontier. Rather, the divisions were deployed in central Czechoslovakia, within striking distance of the main cities; Prague, Bratislava, Olomone, Brno, and Ostrava, and arranged so that they divided the country in two, cutting off Bohemia and Moravia from Slovakia. This deployment was clearly designed to maintain internal security and to monitor the loyalty of the Czech armed forces and police, whose reliability and morale left much to be desired in the Soviet view.

Simultaneously, the Warsaw Pact signatories plunged into an intensive round of national and multinational exercises, high-level military conferences and inspections. There is little doubt that Pact authorities were anxious to resume the training programs interrupted by the invasion, and to draw the Czechoslovak armed forces back into the fold. There was also a tightening of discipline as well as an effort to keep Pact forces occupied in a very comprehensive exercise schedule.
Politically, the Brezhnev Doctrine provided the background for the unrelenting pressure which the Soviet Union brought against Dubcek and his colleagues after their anguishing negotiations in Moscow between August 23rd and 26th. This pressure led to the removal of Dubcek as First Party Secretary on April 17, 1969, and his replacement by Gustav Husak, who was more likely to be an uncritical supporter of all Soviet demands on his Party and State. [26]

The invasion of Czechoslovakia by Soviet forces may have solved the short-term problem by putting a stop to the unrestricted phase of the Dubcek liberal experiment and returning the country to the control of the orthodox Communists, but it left unsolved the pre-crisis disagreement over the rights and privileges of the non-Soviet members of the Pact and the role of the Pact as a forum for genuine discussion and debate. The main legacy of the crisis as far as the Warsaw Pact was concerned is that Czechoslovakia, once one of the few genuinely pro-Soviet, moreover, pro-Russian countries in Eastern Europe, was imbued with feelings of distrust and disillusionment which would not be easily overcome. The main Czech criticism leveled at the Soviet Union was that the Soviet leadership had resorted to armed invasion as a means of solving the political differences between them, because they were unable to produce valid political arguments to support their case. The invasion did more than any other Soviet action to confirm the Czechoslovaks (and others) in their belief that their reforms were right for their own country and possibly for the other Communist countries in Eastern Europe. The Czechs continue to believe that the Soviets had nothing but superior force on their side in August 1968, and that this did not provide a "proper" basis for an alliance between equals with vital interests in common. [27]

Once the Soviet Union had settled the Czechoslovak crisis through occupation of the country, the Soviet leadership turned to the task of reorganizing the Pact in order to eliminate some of the national resentments which had obviously contributed to the Pact's turbulent history. The Political Consultative Committee of the Pact was convened in Budapest in March 1969, just six months after the invasion, to give formal approval to documents presumably worked out in detail beforehand in Moscow, (the meeting lasted only two hours), which authorized reorganization of the Pact's military structure. The communique issued after the meeting indicated that a Committee of Defense Ministers of the Pact and a Military Council would be established to advise the Pact's Commander-in-Chief, and that Senior East European officers would henceforth be appointed to the Pact's Command. The Committee of Defense Ministers was to meet at regular intervals to review and approve the decisions made by the other, lesser body, the Military Council. (However, one source stated that the Committee proposals would have to be submitted to some unspecified "appropriate authority" for approval.) The Military Council, though, patterned after the Military Councils which exist at various high levels throughout the Soviet armed forces and which control the activities of arms of Service, military districts and fleets, was the real innovation of the 1969 Budapest reforms. Forming a Warsaw Pact Military Council meant that the East European countries would have greater access to discussion of Warsaw Pact policy, if not actual decision making. In Soviet terms, this reform represented a significant concession to the East European allies, and for the East Europeans, it was a substantial improvement over the situation which existed prior to 1968.

As noted in chapter 3, the Budapest reforms did not give the Warsaw Pact High Command a real command-and-control function, and there was no indication that the Warsaw Pact Headquarters or the Warsaw Pact Staff would have any operations, signals, transportation or supply services which would enable the Pact to function with an independent HQ in wartime. Also, the responsibility for air defense remained with the Soviet Air Defense Command. This implied that air defense was to remain outside the Pact's authority, and that the Soviet Union's air defense frontier would lie along the western borders of the East European states, each country, in effect, an air defense district of the Soviet Union. As suggested, the post-1968 Budapest reforms did not really enhance the WTO's wartime role. The Pact, as a military organization whose purpose and usefulness in Soviet eyes had not basically changed, remained an administrative headquarters within the Soviet Ministry of Defense, designed to rationalize and coordinate East European resources, training and defense policy. There was clearly no
"Warsaw Pact" military doctrine distinguishable from that of the Soviet Union.

With regard to enhancing Pact unity in the political sphere, the PCC, meeting in Bucharest in November 1976, created a new political institution for the alliance. According to the official communique, the Pact "adopted a resolution" to create an organ of the PCC, a Committee of Foreign Ministers, (CFM), with an associated secretariat. The CFM was to be a standing committee charged with working out recommendations on foreign policy questions. Actually, a standing commission with an associated secretariat had existed since the first PCC meeting in 1956, but according to Soviet sources, these organs had not functioned in 21 years. In any event, as a result of the Bucharest meeting, Pact Foreign Ministers, who had in the past met infrequently, began meeting annually in 1977. Little is known of the work of the CFM secretariat, which is headquartered in Moscow, other than that it is staffed by representatives from various Warsaw Pact states, and that it handles administrative matters and implements decisions taken by the CFM. These reforms, however, did provide the Pact with the same continuity in the political sphere that the Budapest reforms had achieved in the military sphere. [28]

In the post-Czech era, Soviet policy in Eastern Europe has evolved into a complex effort to promote cohesion through a comprehensive integrationist policy at every level. With its own powerful armed forces and through the Warsaw Pact its control over the Eastern European armed forces, with the invasion of Czechoslovakia as a harsh reminder of Soviet willingness to impose, by force if necessary, orthodoxy, and with the Brezhnev Doctrine as its ideological support, the Soviet leadership embarked on a comprehensive policy designed to create an atmosphere in which the circumstances which led to the Czech invasion would no longer arise.

Economic integration was still an essential part of the Soviet Union's effort to "perfect" its mechanisms for control over East Europe. In this, of course, the Brezhnev leadership was continuing the policy begun by Khrushchev. But whereas Khrushchev sought integration from above, through a supranational planning body, and failed, Brezhnev sought it from below, "from the bottom up," through a system interlocking the basic elements of the Eastern European economics with each other and principally, with the Soviet Union. This was a multi-faceted, long-range program, which was started with an agreement among several East European governments, including Rumania, to invest in Soviet raw-material industries following the publication in 1971 of the "Comprehensive Program" for integration and the agreement to an overall plan of cooperation effective from 1976, outside the individual national plans of member states. Whereas economic integration (through CMEA) had referred to the Soviet Union's efforts to exploit its East European allies' strength and potential, this new concept of integration was intended, presumably, to make supranational planning seem a logical, almost natural next step. [29]
Though economic integration was reemphasized as an essential part of the Soviet leadership's plan for cohesion within the East European bloc, its new concept of integration went much further. In the post-Czech era there has been far greater stress on political, cultural, ideological, and (as discussed), military integration. The Soviet Union resolved to consult more with its allies, trying to make the Soviet-East European relationship one in which direct pressure was much less needed, but unfortunately the result had been essentially "directed" consultation. On the surface, the Soviet method of consultation with its allies may appear to be a genuine counciliar system, an appearance strengthened by the fact that many of the various meetings are held in East European cities and are presided over by East European officials. Though this is consultation, it is not joint consultation; the inequality of partners is accepted and both discussion and decision proceed on this basis. This does not deny that "heated" discussion does not take place. Rumania has clearly balked at many attempts to reach a consensus on issues they oppose, so, too, have Hungarian delegates put forward specific points of view at variance with the Soviet Union. [30] In matters of lesser importance, the Soviets have allowed themselves to be dissuaded from their original views, but on subjects of vital concern to Soviet leadership, the consensus has been directed.

As an example of continuing Soviet hypocrisy in its relations with the Warsaw Pact countries, despite the post-Czech reforms, I would like to cite the record of East European participation in the Mutual Balanced Force Reduction Talks (MBFR). Since the 1950's the Soviet Union and her WTO allies have spoken of the necessity for arms reduction in vague propagandistic terms and the West has replied in kind. However, in June, 1968, the NATO Council of Foreign Ministers issued a declaration suggesting talks with the Soviet Union and the other WTO countries for the purpose of mutually reducing their armed forces in a balanced and substantial way. The talks were convened in Vienna and continue, but they have yielded scant progress. What is significant is the manner and form of non-Soviet WTO participation.

It was clear from the beginning that within the Warsaw Pact, the Soviet Union would, as always, make the major decisions. The talks only gained momentum after May, 1970, when Brezhnev, in a speech at Tiflis, Georgia, suggested the possibility of talks on arms reduction, but even then the first plenary session of the Preparatory Consultations was not held until three years later. Rumania though, had wanted the opportunity to participate with equal rights both at the preliminary discussions as well as at the negotiations. The Soviet Union, however, decided to exclude not only Rumania, but Hungary as well from full negotiating status. Czechoslovakia, East Germany and Poland were given full status while Rumania had to settle for observer status, together with Bulgaria and Hungary. Thus, while all the WTO members were nominally participating, the Soviets had created subgroupings within the negotiations. It was clear though, as the negotiations progressed, that the "main say" was left to Moscow and that the three full status members had only a limited role in policy formation, while the "observers" made no perceptible input. The MBFR negotiations, therefore, showed Moscow's increased sophistication in the use of the WTO to convey an image of polycentrism while effectively maintaining central control. [31]

The processes of the Brezhnev leadership, aimed at creating a new kind of cohesion between the Soviet Union and the East European states, have been the main Soviet preoccupation in the post-Czech era. The brilliance of Brezhnev's approach is its "grass-roots" orientation; fashioning a cohesion so pervasive that it creates its own viability. But essential to this cohesion is public stability, a truism the Soviet and East European ruling elites have frequently been taught throughout the turbulent history of recent Soviet-East European relations. No sooner had orthodoxy been restored in Czechoslovakia, than "workers" riots broke out in Poland in December, 1970. This upheaval not only led to a change of leadership in Poland, but also sent tremors of renewed uncertainty throughout East Europe. The Polish workers were mollified by a number of important material concessions which attempted to raise considerably the worker's standard of living. As for the rest of Eastern Europe, the desperate actions in Poland gave an impetus to other governments, including the Soviet Union, to incorporate "consumerism" as a basic part of their economic policies. In the GDR it had, in fact, become entrenched before the Polish upheavals. It was also implicit in the Hungarian "New Economic Mechanism", and became a basic part of the Husak regime's "normalization" policy in Czechoslovakia. Unlike the "goulash" Communism of the Khrushchev economic policy, economic consumerism was pursued in an effort to increase viability in Eastern Europe without fundamental institutional change. [32] However, the failure of this policy through the decade of the 1970's to achieve a reasonable standard of living for the East Europeans is at the heart of the more recent Polish crisis.

The unaltered reality of Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe has not been successfully masked by the Brezhnev integrationist schemes. The inability of the Soviet Union to accept the East European allies as independent, sovereign states in the political, economic and military spheres dooms any initiative they may take at creating viable relationships in Eastern Europe. As we have seen, within the framework and limitations of the Soviet concepts of defense and military strategy, the WTO performs useful political and military functions. Through it, the military manpower, skills and resources of the East European countries have been rationally utilized to help fulfill Soviet defense requirements. The fundamental weakness of the Pact in political terms is summed up by the fact that Soviet armed forces have been repeatedly used in action against their Warsaw Treaty allies: East Germany in 1953, Hungary in 1956, and Czechoslovakia in 1968 -- and action in Poland was only narrowly avoided in 1956, 1970, and possibly 1980. The hard fact of life for the Soviet leaders is that they must always regard the populations of their allies as potentially unreliable, so that they can neither rely fully on their multi-lateral institutions nor, in particular, admit their East European allies into full partnership in the military side of the alliance.
V. CONCLUSIONS

The WTO is very much a Soviet creature, though an organizational infant with respect to classic alliance theory. Nevertheless, it has evolved (see Figure 5.1) greatly from the dormant paper organization of the 1950's to one with important military and political roles. Polycentrism, economic growth, interbloc relations, arms control, detente and European security have all shaped the evolution of the Pact. Changes, then, have come from both internal and external pressures, of which the Sino-Soviet split, Rumanian dissidence, Czech liberalism and the Helsinki accords are but representative examples. Despite the many problems Soviet decision makers face in constructing a satisfactory relationship with their East European allies, the WTO nonetheless is a vital element in that long term process. The role of the Warsaw Pact, in the Soviet view, has not basically changed in the past 25 years. The Soviet Union still needs the Pact as a conduit to transmit military, political and ideological imperatives to its East European allies. Militarily, it serves to administer the East European armed forces, acting as an extension of the Soviet Ministry of Defense. Politically, it has evolved toward a forum for presentation of East European views, though the Soviets have exerted the primacy of their own interests at the expense of inter-alliance cordiality. The Pact has been most effective at harnessing the military resources of Eastern Europe to the task of supporting Soviet security. Of course, the Warsaw
FIGURE 5.1
EVOLUTION OF THE WARSAW PACT

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Period</th>
<th>Characterization</th>
<th>Number of PCC Meetings</th>
<th>Number of Joint Exercises</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1955-1960</td>
<td>&quot;benign neglect&quot;</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(1955-1968)</td>
<td>Khrushchev era (viability)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1961-1968</td>
<td>&quot;the awakening&quot;</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968-</td>
<td>Brezhnev era (cohesion)</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>50*</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968-1979</td>
<td>&quot;the coming of age&quot;</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

*date to 1979, (note) only 7 exercises after 1975.

Pact brings some benefits to the smaller East European countries; it relieves them of the burden of individual defense and places them under the nuclear umbrella of the superpowers; and it provides their armed forces with up-to-date weapons (Fig. 5.2), which they might not otherwise be able to afford.

However, the Warsaw Pact, as it has evolved, represents a fundamental, possibly unresolvable set of contradictions. This problem stems from the Soviet insistence upon incorporating in one organization arrangements relating to the vital security interests of the Soviet state, and a political structure designed to promote bloc solidarity and unanimous support for Soviet foreign policy views, while simultaneously attempting to present the Pact to the world as a classical alliance, or at least an East European forum with which the West can conduct meaningful negotiations on European security (CSME) and arms control (MBFR). The fact of the matter is that a classical alliance between sovereign states cannot satisfy the requirements of Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe. The prospect of allowing the East European countries to participate in a meaningful way in military, political or economic affairs is, at the present, inadmissible. The dilemma facing the Soviets is that, as long as the Warsaw Pact is a military/political administrative organization tied to Soviet institutions, it cannot become a classical alliance of equals in the Western sense; yet if it does not make substantial progress
FIGURE 5.2

DISTRIBUTION OF SELECTED SOVIET WEAPONS in NON-SOVIET WARSAW PACT ARMED FORCES

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Medium Tanks</th>
<th>APC's</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>East Germany</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poland</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Czechoslovakia</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hungary</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rumania</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bulgaria</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

*Date of Introduction (DOI) Soviet forces

toward becoming such an alliance, or at least a genuine forum of East European opinion, the Soviets will be faced with continued discontent, dissent and revolt. A solution will involve either a return to bilateral operations (as has happened in each crisis situation), or a resort to a massive subjugation reminiscent of Stalin's treatment of the problem. Whether Soviet imperatives can ever be reconciled or harmonized through a system that discounts general East European views and does not take into account the variety and diversity of needs and aspirations of the region is a matter of great doubt. Internal autonomy directly challenges the ideological base of the Soviet system and thus the internal security of the Soviet State, while independence in foreign policy matters erodes Soviet power in world affairs and constitutes a challenge to external Soviet ideological aims. The Soviets continue to face an arduous rear-guard action against the forces of disintegration, and it is not far-fetched to speculate that the concept of "polycentrism," rather than falling on the "rubbish heap of history," may accurately depict future trends. As time goes on, the ideological base binding East European Communist states will continue to erode, difficulties will arise from the breakdown of cooperation within the Soviet system and the ensuing hardships will certainly lead to mass discontent. The countries of Eastern Europe are likely to become more "European" and much less "Communist" in the years ahead. (Note Poland in 1980-81.)
Continuation of the Soviet integrationist drive in Eastern Europe will also depend on the Brezhnev succession in the Soviet Union. If a serious struggle ensues: (1) Soviet authority could decline throughout Eastern Europe; (2) uncertainty could produce a revival or factionalism in some East European leaderships; (3) leaderships could again begin orienting their policies along more national lines; (4) intra-East European groupings could begin to form; and (5) some states could seek closer economic ties with the West. A Soviet succession crisis could thus have profound consequences for Soviet-East European/Warsaw Pact relations. If there was a protracted succession crisis, then it would be difficult to see how the infrastructure of integration, which Brezhnev has so carefully built in the post-Czech era, would survive the reemergence of those centrifugal forces which, though latent, have not yet been eradicated. Brezhnev's infrastructure is still far from complete and still too fragile. Not simply a decade, but more like a whole generation or more of patient building will be needed to justify Soviet confidence in its durability. Disintegrating forces could emerge on both the domestic and national levels, serious friction between the Soviet Union and its East European allies could come to the point of renewed military intervention. The new leaders who emerge from the succession period will have to begin again designing a system that recombines the Soviet imperative of cohesion and the East European need for viability.
Prospects for the immediate future are for a further intensification of Soviet integrationist policies. With the present Soviet leadership, attempts to further impose orthodox conformity and closer control over East European economic, military, foreign policy and ideological areas is likely to increase. Despite the fact that the Warsaw Pact was born of Moscow's Cold War strategies, it has acquired real substance largely in relation to the achievement of the above goals. Under multiple pressures, the Soviet attitude toward the Warsaw Pact has become more complex, but the need to upgrade the Pact as an instrument through which Soviet power can be manifested is a process with much continuity. In the words of one Soviet author:

"The development of cooperation, including of military cooperation, of the countries of Socialism, is based on the fact that they have a uniform ideology, i.e., the Marxist-Leninist concept, and a common goal, namely the building of Communist society and its defense against the feeble impulses of internal and external counter-revolutions." [1]

Although laced with some ambiguity, this is perhaps as clear a statement of the principle (if not always the practice) underlying the Warsaw Pact.

To a great extent, Western analysts "mirror image" the Warsaw Pact in terms of NATO. (In the introduction I warned against such a practice, and hoped to illustrate the basic distinction between the WTO and a classic alliance.) All alliances are phenomena of international politics; as such, they are transactions or agreements for the achievement of specific objects. (Most alliances are concerned first and foremost with defense outlays, not only on the technological and logistical plane, but also through the implications of these matters for strategic and political planning.) They are always "against" someone or some thing and are formed out of the adoption of a common stand in an international conflict situation. [2] Specifically, an alliance refers to the relationship between two or more states which includes:

a. collaboration with one another for a period of limited duration, regarding a militarily perceived problem,

b. an aggregation of their capabilities for participation in international affairs,

c. pursuit of national interests jointly, with parallel courses of action,

d. probability that assistance will be rendered by members to one another. [3]

What distinguishes alliances from other forms and other experiences in international cooperation, such as integration, multinational community building, and economic partnership are the presence of such factors as:

a. existence of an enemy or enemies, actual or anticipated,

b. contemplation of risk of war,

c. mutuality of interest in either preserving the status quo or aggrandizement in regard to territory, population, strategic resources, etc. [4]

A collective goods analysis of the Warsaw Pact assumes that one of the purposes of the organization is that it serves the common interests of its members. In the general study of alliances, this purpose is simply, security -- the protection of member states by the collectivity. More specifically, the main purpose of an alliance such as NATO and presumably the Warsaw Pact is "deterrence," the forestalling of aggression against members of the organization. Harvey Starr, in his article, "A Collective Goods Analysis of the Warsaw Pact After Czechoslovakia" concludes that:

"... the value of the WTO and the relationship of its members to the Soviet Union, as summarized by measures of collective goods, appear not have been altered to any extent by the events of August 1968." [6]

Harvey Starr is right to assert that Soviet policy in the Pact reflects a great deal of continuity. The Soviet commitment to the Pact as a multinational instrument for control is not disputed. I would take exception with Starr over his first basic assumption: that is, that the Warsaw Pact is an alliance. By any of Friedman's definitions, the Pact under Soviet tutelage is a gross departure from the criteria set forth. The "common interests" in the Warsaw Pact are Soviet interests, be they the preservation of the gains of Socialism or the furtherance of World revolution. The individual concerns, needs and aspirations of the East European countries

---

20 A "Collective Goods" framework deals directly with the purposes, functions and benefits of organizations. This approach was originally developed by Marcus Olsen and has been fruitfully applied to the study of alliances. [5] are of little concern to the Soviets, unless dissent and revolt threaten Soviet security. The Warsaw Pact is certainly not an alliance in the classic sense; if anything, it represents a perverse Soviet attempt to legitimize imperialist tendencies.

But for all our Western criticism, the Pact is a "Soviet" alliance, and should be viewed with this caveat in mind. The essence of the WTO, according to Soviet commentators, derives from the "community of Socialist States," a "new" kind of international system, (one in which the Soviets reserve the right to define each actor's limits of sovereignty) based on mutual aid and eschewing all forms of exploitation, whether of its own members or of other political actors. This glowing version was portrayed, for example, in a speech by Brezhnev as late as December, 1975. The Socialist Community, he affirmed,

"... is a voluntary alliance of equal, sovereign, and independent states, which, being Socialist ones, draw for strength and well-being only on the free work of their peoples, knowing no exploitation at home and not exploiting the labor or riches of other countries or peoples." [7]

Soviet Marshal Yakubovsky goes so far as to argue that the WTO essentially differs from all past coalitions, and from military and political blocs presently linking the imperialist countries. He bases his claim on five main propositions (which, however, do not hold up if examined against the historical record):
Proposition 1. The WTO is a "voluntary" organization. (even if this were true, it is hardly unique among alliances.)

Proposition 2. The WTO is based on the principle of total equality of participants.

Proposition 3. The "alliance" of the Socialist countries is a genuinely defensive organization.

Proposition 4. Unlike NATO, the Warsaw Pact is not a narrow, closed military organization.

Proposition 5. Unlike NATO, troops of the Warsaw Pact continue to be directly subordinate to the national commands, attesting to the mutual respect for sovereignty of allied commands.

Although Marshal Yakubovsky's propositions are interesting, I would like the reader to reflect on the history of Soviet policy in the Warsaw Pact to judge just how diluted one's understanding becomes when encased in Marxist-Leninist ideology. If the Soviets tend to think in terms of a Socialist utopia based on dialectic principles without regard for the stark, often harsh reality of the present, then I suggest Yakubovsky's view of the Pact is almost the best example I could cite.

The Warsaw Pact is certainly not an alliance in the classic, Western sense. The common interests of the member states are not pursued or maximized through collective efforts, the security of the East European states are more threatened by their Russian mentor than they ever were threatened by Western Europe, NATO or the United States. The Pact is rather a "Delian League," an immoral institution imposed on the countries of Eastern Europe by an aggressive, imperialist Soviet State for the purpose of shielding themselves from a continued Western threat. The Pact, though it loses credibility on a theoretical plane, does, however, present a significant military capability. Whether the Soviets would use the Pact in an aggressive fashion is strictly conjecture. Of all the aspects of the WTO, though, the most significant is that it has enabled the Soviets, through the East European armed forces, to maintain its dominance in a region which is historically, strategically, and ideologically vital to Soviet State interests.

The Delian League was a confederacy of Greek states under the leadership of Athens, headquartered at Delos, established in 478-477 B.C. after the initial repulse of the Persians from Greece. It was dissolved in 404, when Athens capitulated to Sparta at the end of the Peloponnesian War.

Thucydides briefly lays out the original organization of the League in his book, The Peloponnesian War. All Greeks were invited to join with Athens in a confederacy against future Persian incursions. The Athenians were to supply the commanders-in-chief, who would preside over meetings of the League to discuss policy. These meetings were to be held at Delos, (hence the name Delian League) and there in the Temple of Apollo the treasury was to be kept. Simple oaths of loyalty were taken by the allies to Athens and to the alliance. The autonomy of the members was assumed rather than made explicit.

However, as Athens increased in power and wealth, the League came under Athenian dominance. The Athenians moved the treasury from Delos to Athens, using these resources to further their interests. By the end of the war with Persia, the League, dominated by Athens, became an acknowledged Athenian empire. The allies' independence was seriously undermined, and tribute collection was tightened. Though these measures were unpopular among the allies, Athens refused to compromise. Various revolts broke out and were suppressed. Finally, when Samos revolted in 440 B.C. Athens entered into the Peloponnesian War (431-404), which imposed serious strains on the alliance. The Athenians demanded increased tribute to finance the War and increased military support to replace their own losses. The revolt of the Mytilene, crushed in 428-427 B.C., marked the apex of the Athenian degeneracy. Other areas of the empire remained relatively secure until the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily (413 B.C.). After the Sicilian disaster, revolt spread more widely, and the Athenian empire passed into history.
It is relevant to note that Athens was a rising power, with a dynamic concept of purpose, and was compelled to act (in the Peloponnesian War) for security imperatives. The story of Athens and the League is one of ethics vs. expediency and the corruptive influence of power and of war. I leave it to the reader to reflect on the lessons of Athens and the Delian League with respect to the Soviet State and the Warsaw Pact.
APPENDIX A

THE WARSAW TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, CO-OPERATION AND MUTUAL ASSISTANCE

Between the People's Republic of Albania, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, the Hungarian People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Polish People's Republic, the Rumanian People's Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the Czechoslovak Republic.

The contracting parties,

Reaffirming their desire for the organization of a system of collective security in Europe, with the participation of all the European states, irrespective of their social and state systems, which would make it possible to combine their efforts in the interests of securing peace in Europe.

Taking into consideration at the same time the situation obtaining in Europe, as the result of ratification of the Paris agreements, which provide for the formation of a new military grouping in the shape of 'Western European Union' together with a remilitarized Western Germany and for the integration of Western Germany in the North Atlantic bloc, which increases the threat of another war and creates a menace to the national security of the peace-loving states,

Convinced that, under these circumstances, the peace-loving states of Europe should take the necessary measures for safeguarding their security, and in the interests of maintaining peace in Europe,

Guided by the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter,

In the interests of further strengthening and promoting friendship, co-operation and mutual assistance, in accordance with the principles of respect for the independence and sovereignty of states, and also with the principle of non-interference in their internal affairs,

Have resolved to conclude this Treaty of Friendship, Co-operation and Mutual Assistance and have appointed as their authorized representatives:

The Presidium of the People's Assembly of the People's Republic of Albania - Mehmet Shchu, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the People's Republic of Albania,

The Presidium of the People's Assembly of the People's Republic of Bulgaria - Vulko Chervenkov, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the People's Republic of Bulgaria,

The President of the Hungarian People's Republic, Andras Hegedus, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Hungarian People's Republic,

The President of the German Democratic Republic - Otto Grotewohl, Prime Minister of the German Democratic Republic,

The State Council of the Polish People's Republic - Jozef Cyrankiewicz, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Polish People's Republic,

The Presidium of the Grand National Assembly of the Rumanian People's Republic - Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Rumanian People's Republic,

The President of the Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics - Nikolai Alexandrovich Bulganin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR,

The President of the Czechoslovak Republic - Vilim Siroky, Prime Minister of the Czechoslovak Republic,

Who, having presented their credentials, found to be executed in due form and in complete order, have agreed on the following:

Article 1

The contracting parties undertake, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations Organization, to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force, and to settle their international disputes by peaceful means so as not to endanger international peace and security.

Article 2

The contracting parties declare their readiness to take part, in the spirit of sincere co-operation, in all international undertakings intended to safeguard international peace and security and they shall use all their energies for the realization of these aims.

Moreover, the contracting parties shall work for the adoption, in agreement with other states... desiring to co-operate in this matter, of effective measures towards a general reduction of armaments and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other weapons of mass destruction.

Article 3
The contracting parties shall take council among themselves on all important international questions relating to their common interests, guided by the interests of strengthening international peace and security.
They shall take council among themselves immediately, whenever, in the opinion of any of them, there has arisen the threat of an armed attack on one or several states that are signatories of the treaty, in the interests of organizing their joint defense and of upholding peace and security.

Article 4
In the event of an armed attack in Europe on one or several states that are signatories of the treaty by any state or group of states, each state that is a party to this treaty shall in the exercise of the right to individual or collective self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations Organization, render the state or states so attacked immediate assistance, individually and in agreement with other states that are parties to this treaty, by all the means it may consider necessary, including the use of armed force. The states that are parties to this treaty shall immediately take council among themselves concerning the necessary joint measures to be adopted for the purpose of restoring and upholding international peace and security.

In accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations Organization, the Security Council shall be advised of the measures taken on the basis of the present article. These measures shall be adopted as soon as the Security Council has taken the necessary measures for restoring and upholding international peace and security.

Article 5
The contracting parties have agreed on the establishment of a joint command for their armed forces, which shall be placed, by agreement among these parties, under this command, which shall function on the basis of jointly declared principles. They shall also take other concerted measures necessary for strengthening their defence capacity, in order to safeguard the peaceful labour of their peoples, to guarantee the inviolability of their frontiers and territories and to provide safeguards against possible aggression.

Article 6
For the purpose of holding the consultations provided for in the present treaty among the states that are parties to the treaty, and for the purpose of considering problems arising in connection with the implementation of this treaty, a political consultative committee shall be formed in which each state that is a party to this treaty shall be represented by a member of the government, or any other specially appointed representative.
The committee may form the auxiliary organs for which the need may arise.

Article 7
The contracting parties undertake not to participate in any coalition and alliances, and not to conclude any agreements the purposes of which would be at variance with those of the present treaty.
The contracting parties declare that their obligation under existing international treaties are not at variance with the provisions of this treaty.

Article 8
The contracting parties declare that they will act in the spirit of friendship and co-operation with the object of furthering the development of and strengthening the economic and cultural relations between them, adhering to the principles of mutual respect for their independence and sovereignty, and of non-interference in their internal affairs.

Article 9
The present Treaty is open to the accession of other states - irrespective of their social and state systems - which may express their readiness to assist, through participation in the present Treaty, in combining the efforts of the peace-loving states for safeguarding the peace and security of the peoples. This act of acceding to the Treaty shall become effective with the consent of the states which are party to the Treaty, after the instrument of accession has been deposited with the Government of the Polish People's Republic.

Article 10
The present Treaty is subject to ratification, and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the Government of the Polish People's Republic.
The Treaty shall take effect on the date on which the last ratification instrument is deposited. The Government of the Polish People's Republic shall advise the other states that are party to the Treaty of each ratification instrument deposited with it.

Article 11
The present Treaty shall remain in force for twenty years. For the contracting parties which will not have submitted to the Government of the Polish People's Republic a statement denouncing the Treaty a year before the expiration of its term, it shall remain in force throughout the following ten years.
In the event of the organization of a system of collective security in Europe, and the conclusion of a general European Treaty of collective security to that end, which the contracting parties shall unceasingly seek to bring about, the present Treaty shall cease to be effective on the date the general European Treaty comes into force.

Source: Malcolm Mackintosh, The Evolution of the Warsaw Pact (London: The Institute for Strategic Studies, Adelphi Papers, APPENDIX B

"Network of Treaties"

The system of bi-lateral treaties between the Warsaw Pact nations:
F — treaty for friendship, cooperation, and mutual assistance; T — troop stationing treaty; 1948/1967 — 1948 is the year the treaty was concluded, 1967 its year for renewal; 1949 — year of dissolution of the treaty.

SOVIET-EAST EUROPEAN BILATERAL TREATY SYSTEM

LIST OF REFERENCES

CHAPTER I

CHAPTER II

2. Ibid., p. 826.

4. Ibid.

5. Ibid., p. 11.

7. Ibid., p. 23.

8. Ibid., p. 27.

9. Ibid., p. 29.

13. Ibid., p. 75

15. Wolfe, p. 78.

16. Ibid., p. 79.

18. Ibid., p. 15.

19. Ibid., p. 17.

20. Mackintosh, p. 3.

22. Remington, p. 23.

CHAPTER III

2. Ibid., p. 33.

3. Ibid., p. 35.

4. Ibid., p. 36.

8. Ibid., p. 3.

11. Ibid., p. 21.

12. Ibid.

13. Ibid., p. 19.

14. Johnson, Has East Central Europe Become a Liability to the USSR?, p. 5.

17. Wolfe, p. 149.

18. Mackintosh, p. 3.

20. Mackintosh, p. 5.

22. Ibid., p. 147

23. Ibid., p. 150.

25. Mackintosh, p. 5.

27. Ibid.

30. Ibid.

31 Ibid., p. 12.

32. Mackintosh, p. 6.
CHAPTER IV

3. Ibid., p. 834.

5. Ibid., p. 171.

8. Ibid., p. 86.

10. Ibid., p. 55.

12. Ibid.

15. Brown, p. 16.
17. Ibid., p. 298.
19. Ibid., p. 12.
20. Ibid.
22. Ibid., p. 831.
23. Ibid., p. 845.
24. Remington, p. 16.
26. Mackintosh, p. 16.
27. Ibid., p. 15.
30. Brown, p. 27.

CHAPTER V

3. Ibid., p. 5.

4. Ibid.

6. Ibid., p. 332.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

INITIAL DISTRIBUTION LIST

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No. Copies</th>
<th>Name and Address</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>
| 2          | Defense Technical Information Center
             Cameron Station
             Alexandria, Virginia  22314 |
| 2          | Library, Code 0142
             Naval Postgraduate School
             Monterey, California 93940 |
| 1          | LT. David L. Greene, USN
             11005 Pleasant Lake Road
             Manchester, Michigan  48158 |
| 1          | Professor Stephen A. Garrett
             International Policy Studies
             Monterey Institute of International Studies
             425 Van Buren Street
             Monterey, California  93940 |