EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Background

Following the formation of the Defence Personnel Executive (DPE), HDPE directed that a common Defence attitude survey should be developed. The aim of the survey was to replace the existing single Service attitude surveys. The amalgamation of these surveys has facilitated comparison and benchmarking of attitudes across the three Services whilst maintaining a measure of single Service attitudes.

The Directorate of Strategic Personnel Planning and Research (DSPPR) was tasked by HDPE with the development of the first common attitude survey instrument in 1998. This survey was sent to approximately 20% of uniformed and civilian personnel in July-August 1999. DSPPR was directed to re-administer the Defence Attitude Survey in 2001 and the administration took place in March/April. The survey was administered to approximately 30% of uniformed and civilian personnel.

The aims of the Defence Attitude Survey are to: inform personnel policy and planning; both centrally and for the single Services/Australian Public Service (APS); provide Defence Groups with a picture of organisational climate; and, provide ongoing measurement in relation to the Defence Matters scorecard.

Methodology

The sample was stratified by Service/Civilian groups and rank/APS level and generally comprised 30% of each Service and rank. The 'paper and pencil' scannable forms were posted directly to Australian Defence Force (ADF) members work addresses and were distributed to civilians via regional paycentres. The average response rate was 55%.

Demographic profile of respondents

There were some clear differences between the personal details/ demographic characteristics of the Civilian and ADF personnel surveyed. For example, Civilian respondents tended to be older, contained a higher percentage of females, location differed (e.g., a higher proportion of Civilians worked in the ACT) and length of service and intention to stay were longer for Civilians. There were also some differences between ADF groups, but these were less marked than the ADF/Civilian differences.

Attitude Results

2001 Organisational Indicators

The sixteen 2001 'organisational indicators' included thirteen statistically derived factors and three individual items related to personal morale, unit morale and intention to leave. The indicators with the most positive overall ratings included attitudes toward personal Performance, immediate Supervision and Job Satisfaction. The most negative indicators included Change, Conditions, Continuing Career, Career Development, and Effect on Family Life.

Civilian respondents were more positive than all three ADF groups in terms of Conditions and the Effect on Family Life and were more negative regarding Senior Staff Leadership. A significantly smaller proportion of Civilians than ADF personnel stated that they were actively looking at leaving.

Where there were significant differences between ADF groups, Air Force more often tended to differ from the other two Services. The Air Force was more positive than the other two Services in terms of views regarding Conditions, Effect on Family Life and their intention to stay. The Air Force was less positive regarding Senior Defence Leadership, Change, and Career Development than the other two Services. Air Force was more positive than Navy regarding Job Satisfaction.

Army most often showed the most positive organisational indicator scores of the ADF groups though these differences were not always statistically significant. Army were significantly more positive than both the other Services with regard to Organisational Commitment. They were more positive than Navy for Service Life, Performance, unit and personal morale and The Service and more positive than Air Force for Supervision and Senior Staff Leadership.

Navy showed significantly lower intention to stay scores than the other two ADF groups.

1999 to 2001 Changes in Organisational Indicators

Of the fourteen within Service statistically significant changes in organisational indicator scores between 1999 and 2001, ten were in the positive direction. Civilians became more positive regarding personal and unit morale and less positive regarding Effect on Family Life and Senior Defence Leadership. Navy became more negative regarding Effect on Family Life. Army became more positive regarding Supervision, Organisational Commitment and unit morale but more negative regarding Effect on Family Life. Air Force improved on five indicators: Service, Life, Organisational Commitment, unit morale, personal morale and Change.

Individual Attitude Item Responses

Examination of average item responses showed significant consistency in the most positively rated items across the Service/Civilian groups. There was also considerable consistency across groups for the most negatively rated items, though to a lesser extent. Items with very high positive ratings included those related to quality of own work, pride in work, job performance and the importance of positive working relationships. Ratings with the least positive overall ratings included issues related to inadequate personnel numbers, the decline in military values/standards and lack of resources.

1999 and 2001 changes in item results were examined and again showed considerable consistency across Service groups in terms of the most positive and negative item changes. The most positive changes related to satisfaction with communication regarding change, immediate supervisors and morale. Negative changes included the effect of recent change on promotion prospects and opportunities and change reducing job security.

Conclusions

The results of the 2001 Defence Attitude Survey and comparisons with the 1999 survey data show that although some differences exist between Defence Service groups, there are also considerable consistencies in views, particularly between ADF groups. This supports the view that there are some personnel initiatives which are relevant for implementation within the entire ADF and in some cases, the entire Defence organisation. Other issues are clearly more Service specific.

The present Defence Attitude Survey will be continued at 18 month to two year intervals and quarterly attitude survey 'dips' of approximately 10% sample size are also planned in order to ensure shorter feedback cycles on Defence issues, particularly in relation to the organisational renewal agenda. This will allow both the tracking of key attitudinal or organisational climate issues over time as well as facilitate the measurement of additional topical personnel issues as prioritised by the Services and HDPE.

INTRODUCTION

Background

Following the formation of the Defence Personnel Executive (DPE), HDPE directed that a common Defence attitude survey should be developed. The aim of the survey was to replace the existing single Service attitude surveys including the RAN Employee Attitude Survey (RANEAS), the RAAF General Attitude Survey (RGAS), the Soldier Attitude and Opinion Survey (SAOS) and the Officer Attitude and Opinion Survey (OAOS). The amalgamation of these surveys has facilitated comparison and benchmarking of attitudes across the three Services whilst maintaining a measure of single Service attitudes.

The Directorate of Strategic Personnel Planning and Research (DSPPR) was tasked by HDPE with the development of the common survey instrument in 1998. A working group comprised of representatives of the Service psychology directorates, career management agencies and DSPPR developed the instrument, drawing on the content of the previous single Service surveys. A topical supplement on the Defence Reform Program (DRP) was also included at the request of the Strategic Monitoring and Report Team (SMART). This survey was sent to approximately 20% of uniformed and Civilian personnel in July-August 1999 (DSPPR reports RN13-16/1999 and RR1/2000 report the results of the 1999 survey).

DSPPR was directed to re-administer the Defence Attitude Survey in 2001, through the Defence Committee, the CDF and Secretary endorsed the content of the 2001 survey and the administration took place in March/April. The survey was administered to approximately 30% of uniformed and Civilian personnel.

Aims

- To inform personnel policy and planning, both centrally and for the single Services/APS;
- to provide Defence Groups with a picture of organisational climate; and
- to provide ongoing measurement in relation to the Defence Matters scorecard.

METHODOLOGY

As per the 1999 survey, the 2001 Defence attitude survey comprised four essentially parallel questionnaires, one for each Service and one for Defence Civilians. Each 2001 questionnaire contained 31 to 39 personal details/demographic items (Navy 39, Army and Air Force 35 and Civilian 31) and 117 attitude and belief items, 110 for Civilians. Personal details or demographic information collected included details such as gender, age, rank, information on deployments, unit type, specialisation, branch, group membership, years of service, ethnic background, highest level of education, postings/promotions and family status. The additional Navy personal details items related to sea service issues (see Annex A for example 2001 Defence Attitude Survey).

Due to Defence reprioritisation of some issues, some changes were made to the 1999 survey instruments for the 2001 administration. The main attitudinal issues of supervision, career management and postings, change, work and Service life, conditions, family and morale were still covered, with greater emphasis on the leadership dimension than in the 1999 survey. Items regarding personal performance, performance culture and information were added. The Civilian version also contained seven attitude and belief items related to APS Values, as requested by the Public Service and Merit Protection Commission. The attitudinal items were measured on a five point scale where one equalled 'Strongly Disagree' and five equalled 'Strongly Agree'. The 1999 topical supplement on the DRP and stress was not included in 2001. The final 2001 survey was somewhat shorter than the 1999 version (1999 contained 155 attitudinal items; 2001 contained 117 attitudinal items, 110 for Civilians).

Although the attitude and belief items were similar across each version of the survey, the terminology was tailored to the particular Service or Civilian group. Respondents were given the opportunity to provide written comments at the end of both the 1999 and 2001 surveys.

For ease of reporting, 'Service' or 'Service group' also includes the Civilian group. 'ADF group' is used to refer specifically to uniformed personnel.

Survey Administration and Procedures

A random sample of Service and Civilian personnel was drawn from the respective personnel databases. The sample was stratified by Service/Civilian groups and rank/APS level and generally comprised 30% of each group/rank. In contrast to the 1999 sample, recruits and officer cadets were not included in the sample, as they were not considered part of the active force. In addition, there was significant over-sampling of some groups. Fifty percent of DSTO personnel and 100% of WO1 (E) and COL/EL2 (E) and above were surveyed. The 100% oversampling of the latter groups was undertaken to take account of the relatively small numbers in these populations.

The survey was administered as a 'paper and pencil' scannable form and employed a 'mail-out, mail-back' methodology. For Service personnel, this was conducted directly from DSPPR in Canberra; for Civilian personnel, the mail-out was conducted via regional shop fronts. Completed questionnaires were returned via preaddressed return envelope directly to DSPPR. Table 1 below outlines the response rates by Service group.

Table 1 Response rates by service.

Response rate	52.0%	50.7%	60.9%	56.2%	54.5%

These response rates were slightly down on the 1999 response rates, but are still at a level generally regarded as satisfactory by social scientists.

Dissemination of Results

In addition to the present report, the results in terms of organisational indicators and item response breakdowns by Service were distributed to senior defence personnel (1 Star and above) at the Secretary's 2001 Leadership Summit. The results were also posted on the DSPPR Defence Intranet site<sup>1</sup>. The summary brochure 'Your Say 2001' was distributed to Defence personnel via Service newspapers and shopfronts. A database of the written comments will be distributed to Service chiefs to allow comments analysis if required.

Demographics

A description of the demographic characteristics of the survey respondents by Service follows. Table 2 below shows the number of returned completed valid surveys by Service (22 Navy, 19 Army, 14 Air Force and eight Civilian surveys did not contain useable data)<sup>2</sup>.

Table 2 Returned completed surveys by Service.

Army	3314	31.1%
Air Force	2307	21.6%
Civilian	3263	30.6%

A total of 4073 comments were received (38% provided comments), 1311 from Army, 1116 from Civilians, 787 were provided by Navy and 859 from Air Force.

Rank and Time Since Last Promotion

Table 3 below shows the rank breakdown of the ADF survey respondents by Service and the APS level breakdown for Civilian respondents. Proportions are unlikely to reflect population proportions for some ranks/APS levels due to oversampling of WO1 (E) and COL/EL2 (E) and above.

Proportions then drop off gradually for each Service for each successive time period, with the exception of a jump for all Services for the final 'more than 9 years' category (particularly for Civilians).

Reserve Membership, Discharge Applications and Civilian Previous Military Service

Between 0.1% (Navy and Air Force) to 1.5% (Army) of ADF respondents indicated that they were currently a member of the Reserve forces. Nearly two percent of Civilian respondents (n=60) indicated that they were currently a member of the Reserves. A total of 447 (6%) ADF respondents indicated that they had submitted an application for discharge, a resignation letter or request to transfer to the Reserves within the last six months (Navy 9%, Army 6% and Air Force 4%).

Just over one quarter (28%) of Civilian respondents had prior military service experience, including Reserves. The greatest proportion of these had Army experience (14%), followed by Air Force and Navy (9% and 5% respectively).

Unit Type

Table 7 below of current unit type by Service shows that the most common unit type was ship or submarine/field force unit/operational unit. The next most common unit for Navy respondents was service unit, training unit for Army and support unit for Air Force.

State and Length of Current Posting

As shown in Table 8, the highest proportion of Navy and Air Force respondents were posted to New South Wales, Queensland for Army, and for Civilians the highest proportion worked in the ACT (approximately one third in each case).

As indicated by Table 9, around one quarter to one third of ADF respondents had been in their current posting/position for less than six months. Of the ADF respondents, there was a relatively high proportion of Air Force respondents (nearly one quarter) who have been in their current posting for more than 36 months.

Length of Service and Intention to Stay

The overall average length of service was 13.8 years. Average length of service for each Service was very similar, all figures rounded to 14 years. Civilian personnel were also asked how many years they had worked in the Australian Public Service (APS) and an average of 12 years was reported. Table 12 shows the proportions of respondents from each Service who had served for each time period and Table 13 shows how long Civilian respondents had served in the APS.

Number of Subordinates

The average number of ADF subordinates by Service was 14 for Navy, 21 for Army, 12 for Air Force and three for Civilians. The average number of APS subordinates was three for Navy and Army, one for Air Force and six for Civilians (see Tables 16 and 17 for numbers of respondents with given numbers of ADF and APS subordinates).

Superannuation and Accommodation

Approximately two thirds of ADF respondents were members of the Military Superannuation Benefits Scheme (MSBS) with one third being Defence Force Retirement and Death Benefits (DFRDB) members. Slightly more Air Force respondents had MSBS superannuation (and conversely less had DFRDB) than the other Services (see table 18).

Plan on a Page and Best Way to Advance Career

The majority of Civilian respondents (80%) had developed a 'Plan-on-a-Page' with their supervisor, followed by Army (19%), Navy (14%) and Air Force (13%). Between 10% to 12% of Service respondents and three percent of Civilian respondents rated the item as not applicable to them. Thirty eight percent of Civilian respondents had developed a 'Plan-on-a-Page' with their subordinates, followed by approximately one fifth (19%) of Army respondents, and 16% and 14% of Navy and Air Force respondents respectively. Approximately one quarter of Service respondents (25% to 30%) and 46% of Civilians rated this latter item as not applicable to them.

In terms of the perceived best way to advance one's career, the highest proportion from all Services selected 'superior performance in your position', for Navy and Army this was followed by 'being noticed by senior leaders' and for Air Force and Civilians, 'relying on yourself' was the second most common selection (see Table 20).

Flexible Working Hours and Gender/Service Unit Composition

Civilians reported the highest availability of flexible working hours, with 89% of Civilian respondents stating they were available in their workplace, followed by Air Force (36%), Navy (32%) and Army (28%). The majority of respondents worked in a mixed gender unit, the highest being Civilians (95%), followed closely by Air Force (94%), Navy (90%) and Army (76%).

The majority of respondents from all Services worked in a mixed Service/Civilian workplace (Civilians 69%, Air Force 66%, Navy 61% and Army 59%) though the majority of respondents worked predominantly with personnel of their own Service group (Army 86%, Air Force 80%, Navy 80% and Civilians 72%).

Equity and Diversity Training, Ethnic Background and Disability

By far the highest proportion of Service respondents who indicated that they had received Equity and Diversity training in the last six months were from Army (80%), followed by Navy (56%), Air Force (44%) and Civilians (30%). Two-thirds to three quarters of respondents felt that the training was worthwhile (Civilians 76%, Navy 70%, Air Force 67% and Army 66%).

The highest proportion of respondents from a non-English speaking background were Civilian respondents (13%), followed by Navy (6%), Army and Air Force (both 5%). A small proportion of respondents identified themselves as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islanders (figures for each Service/Civilian group rounded to 1%).

Five percent of Civilian respondents nominated themselves as having a disability.

Highest Level of Education

The most common level of education among Navy and Army personnel was 'less than year 12'. 'Less than year 12' and 'completed year 12' were the most common level for Air Force with the highest proportion of Civilian staff having a 'diploma/certificate' (see Table 21).

Spouse and Family

The Service group with the highest proportion of respondents with a spouse or partner living with them were the Air Force (72%), followed by Civilians (71%), Army (69%) and Navy (64%). Ten percent of Navy respondents had a spouse or partner that was not living with them, followed by Army (8%), Air Force (6%) and Civilians (4%).

Overall, the most common type of spouse employment was in the private sector, with approximately one third of spouses from each Service and Civilian group in this type of employment. Clearly, the majority of spouses were in paid employment, with less than a quarter involved in full-time home duties or unemployed (see Table 22).

Sixty eight to sixty nine percent of Service respondents indicated that their spouse had employment skills that can be easily transferred from one location to another.

Just under half the respondents from each Service group (Air Force, 49%, Army 47%, Civilians 45% and Navy 43%) indicated that they had children or other recognised dependents living with them. Five to eight percent indicated that they had recognised dependents not living with them. Fourteen to fifteen percent of ADF respondents from each Service indicated that their children or dependents have special requirements (e.g., schooling, medical disabilities) that restrict their posting or career options.

Navy Specific Service Issues

Six percent of Navy respondents indicated that they were submarine qualified and 91% indicated that they had served at sea at some point in their Navy career. Eighty six percent had served at sea with the opposite gender. The most common ship type for those currently serving at sea was Afloat Support and Amphibious (inc. LCH) (24%), followed by FFG (22%), ANZAC class (12%) and FCPB (10%).

Attitude Results

The 2001 Defence Attitude Survey results are presented below in the following sections:

- a. Organisational Indicators – 2001 findings for the Defence organisation as a whole, Service group findings/differences and 1999 to 2001 changes in organisational indicators;
- b. Item level data – 2001 top five and lowest five items by Service, 1999 to 2001 top five most positive and negative item changes by Service, and 2001 most significant Service item differences.<sup>3</sup>

Organisational Indicators

A principal components factor analysis was conducted on the data for each Service and Civilian group in order to determine the main themes or attitudinal constructs being measured by the survey (i.e., factors or ‘organisational indicators’). Factor analysis is a statistical technique whereby items which tap a given broader attitude can be statistically grouped together and essentially allows the determination of subscales within a survey questionnaire (see Annex B for organisational indicators item list).

Although there were some differences between the 1999 and 2001 Defence Attitude Surveys, factor analysis revealed a very similar factor structure between the two questionnaires (i.e., they were shown to be tapping very similar broad attitudinal constructs). Figure 1 shows the average factor scores or ‘organisational indicators’ by Service for the 2001 data. Average factor scores may be considered to be an overall, summary indicator of sentiment on that factor for the group in question. Although average factor ratings varied somewhat across the Services, overall average factor scores revealed Performance as the highest (most positively) rated factor, followed by Supervision and Job Satisfaction. Change received the lowest overall average factor score. In addition to the factors derived from the factor analysis, individual survey items regarding unit morale, personal morale and intention to stay were also included in the list of organisational indicators.

3. The results were subsequently analysed down to finer levels of analysis which included Defence group and two star rank level breakdowns. Further ad hoc analyses were also conducted based on stakeholder requests. It was considered beyond the scope of this general report to present results at a level finer than the Service/Civilian group level.

Table 23 shows the mean organisational indicator scores for each Service group with the highest and lowest scores highlighted. Statistically significant<sup>4</sup> differences in organisational indicator scores (0.01 level confidence intervals) between Service groups are shown by the ticks in the right half of the table. There were no strong trends evident in the number of differences between Service groups. There was some tendency for Civilians to rate either highest or lowest on each indicator, but these differences were not always statistically significant.

Of the ADF groups, Army most often showed the highest or most positive scores on the organisational indicators. Civilian respondents were more positive than all three ADF groups in terms of Conditions and the Effect on Family Life and were more negative regarding Senior Staff Leadership. A significantly smaller proportion of Civilians than ADF personnel stated that they were actively looking at leaving.

Where differences occurred for the ADF groups, Air Force more often tended to differ from the other two Services. The Air Force were significantly more positive than the other two Services in terms of attitudes to Conditions, Effect on Family Life and their intention to stay. The Air Force was significantly less positive with regard to Senior Defence Leadership, Change and Career Development than the other two Services. Air Force was significantly more positive than Navy regarding Job Satisfaction.

Army most often showed the most positive organisational indicator scores of the ADF groups, though as previously mentioned, these differences were not always statistically significant. Army were significantly more positive than both the other Services with regard to Organisational Commitment. They were significantly more positive than Navy for Service Life, Performance, unit and personal morale, The Service and more positive than Air Force for Supervision and Senior Staff Leadership.

Of the ADF groups, Navy showed significantly lower intention to stay scores than the other two Services.

4. Statistically significant differences were determined using 99% confidence intervals (0.01 significance level), where a range around each mean is statistically determined. If the ranges for two means do not overlap, there is a 99% likelihood that there is a 'real difference' between the means rather than one attributable to chance. Some caution should be exercised in interpreting statistically significant differences. Even small differences are likely to be statistically significant when sample sizes are large (as in the present survey) and it is up to the readers interpretation as to whether these differences are meaningful in practical terms

1999 to 2001 Changes in Organisational Indicators

Of the 14 significant changes in organisational indicators between 1999 and 2001, 10 were in the positive direction. Based on confidence intervals calculated at the 0.01 level, Civilians improved (became more positive) with regard to personal morale and unit morale, but became less positive in their views regarding Effect on Family Life and Senior Defence Leadership. Navy showed only one significant change, where respondents were more negative regarding Effect on Family Life. Army was more positive on three indicators: Supervision, Organisational Commitment and unit morale. There was a negative shift for Army respondents regarding Effect on Family Life. Air Force showed improvement on five indicators: Service Life, Organisational Commitment, unit morale, personal morale, and Change (see Annex C for 1999/2001 organisational indicator scores by Service).

Item Level Data

The following item level data shows the top five most positively and negatively rated items by Service group (Tables 24 and 25) followed by discussion of the top five most positive and negative item changes/shifts between the 1999 and 2001 surveys (Tables 26 and 27). Items were selected based on mean or average scores for each group in question.

5	Recent changes to the Service have improved my morale.	Recent changes to the Service have improved my morale.	I want more locational stability for my family.	We never seem to have enough resources to do our job properly.

As shown in Table 24, the top five most positively rated items were the same across the Service groups, though the order differed across the groups. The most negatively rated items (see Table 25) differed slightly, though the negative effects of change featured for most groups. ADF groups showed some significant similarity particularly regarding concern over shortages in personnel and resources and the decline in traditional military values and standards (see Annex D for 2001 item descriptive statistics by Service).

Examination of the combined data for ADF groups showed the top five most positive item responses in order were ‘I have a great deal of pride in my work’, ‘The quality of the work done in my workplace is very important to me’, ‘I do my current job well’, ‘Deciding to join the Service was a definite mistake on my part’, and ‘The working relationships I build are important to the way I achieve results’.

The five most negatively rated items for the combined ADF population were in order from most negative, ‘There are insufficient personnel in units to do the work’, ‘There has been a decline in traditional military values and standards’, ‘We never seem to have enough resources to do our job properly’, ‘There have been lots of surveys recently but nothing ever seems to be done with the results’, and ‘I want more locational stability for my family’.

N.B. All changes in Table 26 were statistically significant at the 0.01 level.

There was an improvement across each ADF group between 1999 and 2001 in terms of satisfaction with communication regarding change (see Figure 2). There were also notable improvements for some items on immediate supervisors (see Table 26). The most negative change for all Service/Civilian groups was ‘Recent changes to the Service have improved my promotional prospects’ (see Figure 3). Additionally, all ADF groups showed a downward trend for ‘Recent changes to the Service have improved my job security’ and ‘Communication between senior Defence leaders and Defence personnel is good’ (see Table 27).

Figure 3 1999 and 2001 average responses for ‘Recent changes to the Service have improved my promotional prospects’ (most negative overall item change).

Examination of the combined average data for ADF groups showed the five most positive item changes from 1999 to 2001 were ‘I am satisfied with the information that has been communicated to me about changes to the Service’, ‘My immediate supervisor ensures our group works together harmoniously’, ‘Recent changes to the Service have improved my morale’, ratings for unit/section morale, and ‘I could just as well be working for a different organisation as long as the type of work was similar’.

The five most negative changes for the total ADF in order from most negative were, ‘Recent changes to the Service have improved my promotional prospects’, ‘Recent changes to the Service have improved my job security’, ‘I see change in the Service as providing new opportunities for me’, ‘Communication between senior Defence leaders and Defence personnel is good’, and ‘The amount of time my job takes up makes it difficult to fulfil my family and/or personal responsibilities’. Annex E contains five point response breakdowns for each 2001 item by Service.

2001 Service Group Item Differences

The items with the most intergroup differences for the 2001 data (i.e., Civilians and at least two Services were statistically significant at the 0.01 level) were as follows:

- My immediate supervisor makes sure I understand his/her own role
- Senior staff are forward thinking and progressive
- I am satisfied with the communication provided by Senior Defence Leadership
- I have confidence in Senior Defence Leadership
- I am satisfied with the performance appraisal system

- My promotion prospects are good
- My career development has generally been good
- Recent changes to the Service have improved my job security
- Recent changes to the Service have improved my promotional prospects
- I like the work in my present posting/position
- My job is repetitive
- Life in the Service is better than I expected before I joined
- Much of what I do in the Service is interesting
- Incidents of discrimination or harassment are managed well in my workplace/section

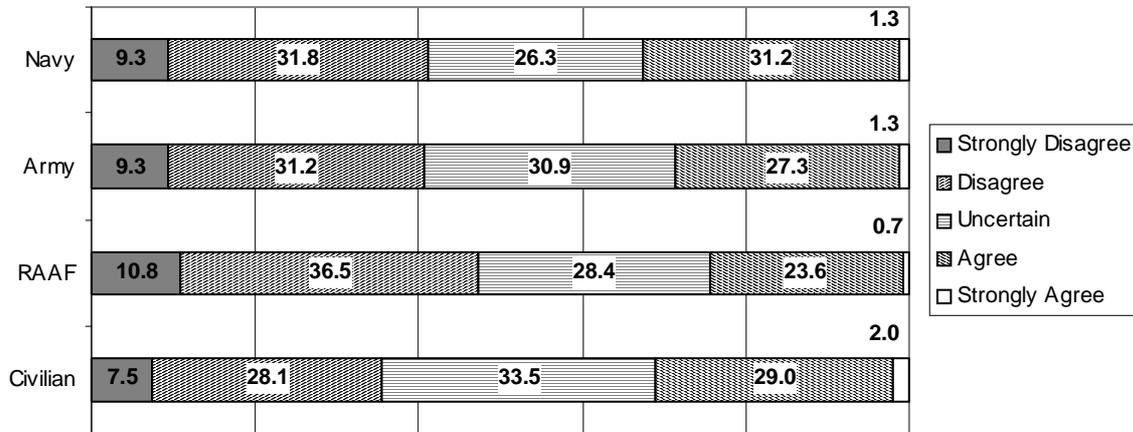

A selection of the above items with some of the clearest Service differences are graphically illustrated below. Figures in charts show percentage response breakdowns for each group.

Navy and Air Force responded similarly to the above item (Figure 4). Army respondents were most likely to agree that Senior Staff are forward thinking and progressive (64% agreed). Only half of Civilian respondents (51%) agreed with the item.

Figure 5 Service item breakdown for ‘I am satisfied with the communication provided by Senior Defence Leadership’.

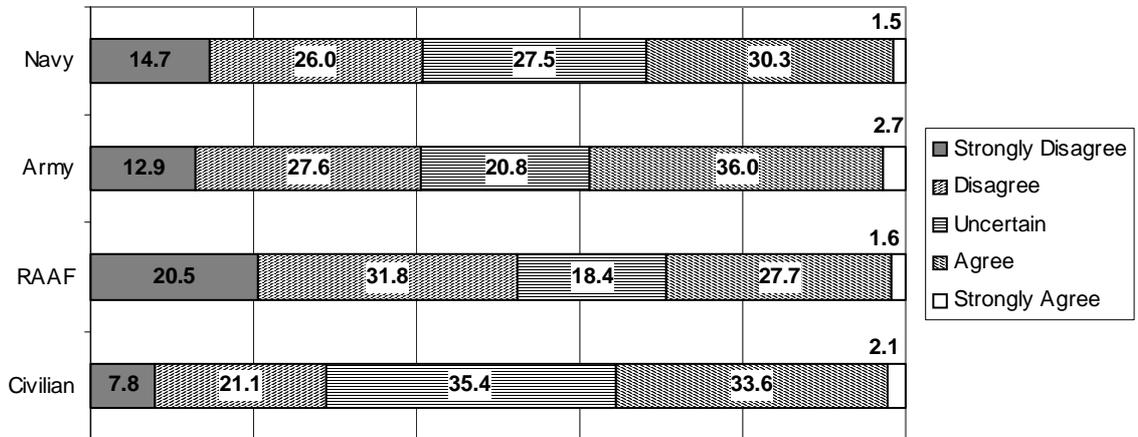

Air Force respondents were most likely to indicate that they were not satisfied with the communication provided by Senior Defence Leadership (47%). Navy respondents were most likely to agree with the statement (one third agreed) (see Figure 5).

For this item (see Figure 6), Navy and Air Force provided a similar response pattern to each other. Army respondents were most likely to indicate that they had confidence in Senior Defence Leadership (38% agreed).

Figure 7 Service item breakdown for 'I am satisfied with the performance appraisal system'.

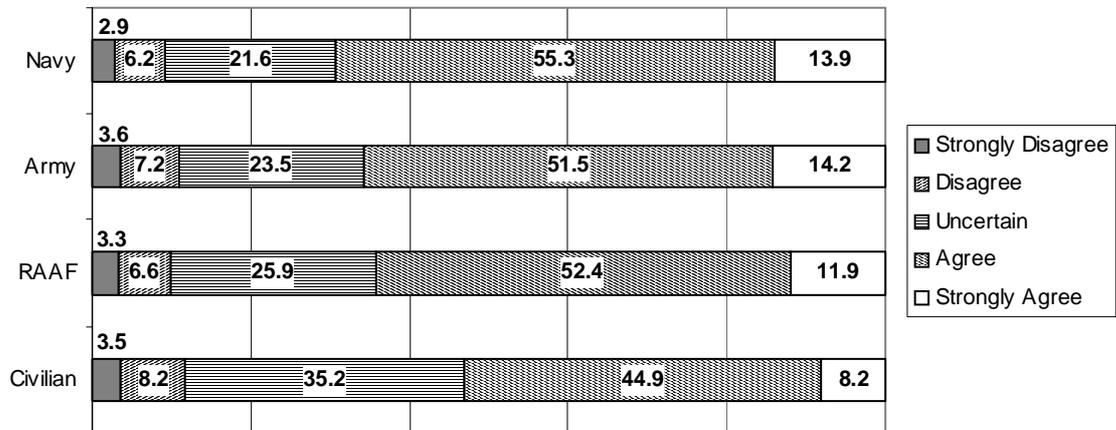

Overall response patterns differed quite significantly on this item (see Figure 7). Air Force respondents were the most likely to disagree with the item (52%) i.e., they were the least satisfied with the performance appraisal system.

Air Force and Civilian groups were less likely to feel that they had good promotion prospects than Navy and Army respondents (see Figure 8).

Figure 9 Service item breakdown for ‘Incidents of discrimination or harassment are managed well in my workplace/section’.

Civilians were less likely to agree than ADF respondents that discrimination or harassment is managed well in their workplace. Of the ADF respondents, Navy were slightly more positive on this item than Army and Air Force (see Figure 9).

DISCUSSION/FINDINGS

Different demographic profiles are apparent between the Service groups (particularly for Civilians versus ADF). These differences may be influencing the satisfiers and dissatisfiers for each group.

As expected, there were some clear differences between the personal details/demographic characteristics of the Civilian and ADF personnel surveyed. For instance, a higher proportion of Civilian personnel received their last promotion more than nine years ago, a far higher proportion of Civilian personnel were female, and Civilians were eight years older on average. Location also differed across the Service groups, with a higher proportion of Civilian respondents working in the ACT. Time in current position, length of service, and intended length of future service all tended to be longer for Civilians. Flexible working hours were clearly more available to Civilians than ADF personnel. Civilians were least likely to nominate that they had received equity and diversity training in the last six months.

Some ADF Service group differences were apparent for rank, generally reflecting the different population rank composition of each Service. Army had a higher proportion of personnel at the PTE (E) level for instance. A lower proportion of Navy respondents nominated the 'more than 9 years' since last promotion category than the other ADF groups. Navy and Air Force showed higher proportions of female respondents than Army. State of present posting also differed across the ADF groups, with higher proportions of Navy and Air Force respondents located in NSW, with the highest proportion of Army respondents posted to Queensland. There was a higher proportion of Air Force respondents who had been in their current posting for more than three years and Air Force respondents were less likely to have been on an operational deployment or served with a US mission. A significantly higher proportion of Army than Navy respondents were living in married quarters and a higher proportion of Air Force than Army were living in their own home. Significantly more Army respondents indicated having received workplace equity and diversity training in the last six months than Navy and Air Force personnel.

The sixteen 2001 'organisational indicators' included thirteen statistically derived factors (combined item measures) and three individual items of particular importance. Civilians tended to rate either highest or lowest on these indicators. Where differences occurred for the ADF groups, Air Force tended to differ from the other two Services. Of the ADF groups, Army most often showed the most positive organisational indicator scores.

Civilian respondents were more positive than all three ADF groups in terms of Conditions and the Effect on Family Life and were more negative regarding Senior Staff Leadership. A significantly smaller proportion of Civilians than ADF personnel stated that they were actively looking at leaving.

Where differences occurred for the ADF groups, Air Force more often tended to differ from the other two Services. The Air Force were significantly more positive than the other two Services in terms of attitudes to Conditions, Effect on Family Life, and their intention to stay. The Air Force was significantly less positive with regard to Senior Defence Leadership, Change and Career Development than the other two Services. Air Force was significantly more positive than Navy regarding Job Satisfaction.

Army most often showed the most positive organisational indicator scores of the ADF groups, though as previously mentioned, these differences were not always statistically significant. Army were significantly more positive than both the other Services with regard to Organisational Commitment. They were significantly more positive than Navy for Service Life, Performance, unit and personal morale, The Service and more positive than Air Force for Supervision and Senior Staff Leadership.

Of the ADF groups, Navy showed significantly lower intention to stay scores than the other two Services.

Comparison of the 1999 and 2001 Defence Attitude Survey Data showed fourteen significant within Service group changes in organisational indicators between 1999 and 2001. Ten of these changes were in the positive direction.

From 1999 to 2001, Civilians became more positive with regard to Personal Morale and Unit Morale, but became less positive in their views regarding Effect on Family Life and Senior Defence Leadership. Navy showed only one significant change, where respondents were more negative regarding Effect on Family Life. Army was more positive on three indicators: Supervision, Organisational Commitment, and Unit Morale. There was a negative shift for Army respondents regarding Effect on Family Life. Air Force showed improvement on five indicators: Service Life, Organisational Commitment, unit morale, personal morale, and Change.

Although Change was the lowest/least positive factor score for the ADO on average, there was significant improvement on this indicator between 1999 and 2001 for Air Force and a marginal, non-statistically significant improvement for Civilians. In addition, the item which showed the greatest improvement in scores for each ADF group between 1999 and 2001 was related to satisfaction with the information that has been communicated regarding changes to the Service.

Examination of average item responses showed significant consistency in the most positively rated items across the Service/Civilian groups. There was also considerable consistency across groups for the most negatively rated items, though to a lesser extent.

The most positively rated items were related to the importance of the quality of work done in the workplace, pride in work, ratings regarding personal job performance, the importance of building good working relationships for the achievement of results and feeling that joining the Service/department was not a mistake.

The most negatively rated items (for ADF personnel) related to insufficient numbers of personnel in units to do the work, the decline in military values and standards, lack of resources, frequency of surveys without followup action and locational stability. Several groups also featured the negative affect of change on personal morale.

1999 and 2001 changes in item results were examined and again showed considerable consistency across Service groups in terms of the most positive and negative item changes.

The most positive item changes were related to satisfaction with communication regarding change, immediate supervisors ensuring the workgroup is harmonious, recent change improving morale, unit morale and organisational commitment.

The most negative item changes featured change in particular and included the failure of recent change to improve promotional prospects and provide new opportunities and change reducing job security. Ratings for communication between personnel and senior leaders dropped and respondents were more negative regarding job commitments and their effect on family/personal life.

Conclusions

The results of the 2001 Defence Attitude Survey and comparisons with the 1999 survey data show that although some differences exist between Defence Service groups, there are also considerable consistencies in views, particularly between ADF groups. This supports the view that there are some personnel initiatives which are relevant for implementation within the entire ADF and in some cases, the entire Defence organisation. Other issues are clearly more Service specific.

The 1999 and 2001 Defence Attitude surveys have shown that some of the organisational indicators with the most positive ratings include attitudes towards personal Performance, immediate Supervision and overall Job Satisfaction. The least positive ratings included attitudes towards Change, Conditions, Effect on Family Life, Senior Defence Leadership and Career Development. The indicators showing significant within Service improvements between 1999 to 2001 were unit and personal morale, Organisational Commitment, Supervision, Service Life and Change. Effect on Family Life and Senior Defence Leadership showed the most within Service negative change. Such findings can be useful in terms of informing present and future personnel initiatives designed to address issues such as retention. In addition to provision of these broader attitudinal climate indicators by Service group, the attitude survey results are being utilised by numerous stakeholders through ad hoc requests for results breakdowns to finer levels.

The present Defence Attitude Survey will be continued at 18 month to two year intervals and quarterly attitude survey 'dips' of approximately 10% sample size are also planned in order to ensure shorter feedback cycles on Defence issues, particularly in relation to the organisational renewal agenda. These smaller surveys will focus on topical issues and will also contain a smaller number of core attitudinal and demographic items which will be re-administered for each quarterly survey. This will allow both the tracking of key attitudinal or organisational climate issues over time as well as facilitate the measurement of additional topical personnel issues as prioritised by the Services and HDPE.

When this is the case simply mark the "not applicable" (N/A) option. A comments section is provided at the end of the survey form for any comment you may wish to make on any items or on any issue that you think has not been sufficiently covered.
